Most military experts are agreed that our most pressing military need is not the purchase of increasingly costly and sophisticated military hardware—and certainly the B-1 bomber falls within this category—rather, our needs are in the conventional forces area. There is no doubt that we must improve the morale and competence of our personnel and provide for the adequate maintenance of our conventional equipment. Yet, as billions of dollars are wasted upon military procurements of limited utility, it is these very elements of our military preparedness that are being ignored.

Moreover, we must recognize that unnecessary spending in the Pentagon weakens, rather than strengthens, our Nation's security. National security is as dependent upon economic stability, national productivity, and energy self-sufficiency as it is upon the number and kind of bombers in our fleet. Choosing to develop the B-1 bomber—a military ornament of only limited utility—will serve only to drive Federal deficits further skyward, to maintain chroncially high interest rates, and to continue to divert critical capital away from the more productive sectors of our economy.

As we struggle to eliminate unnecessary spending throughout Government and to simultaneously forge a strong national defense, Mr. DELLUMS has offered us a well-reasoned course of action. I strongly urge my colleagues to support the amendment to eliminate funding for the B-1 program.

I thank the gentleman in the well, and again, I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) for laying out as sharply as he has the full breadth of the issues that are at stake in this amendment.

Mr. MILLER of California. Well, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

I just think in a very serious nature that those people who are so terribly concerned and go home every weekend and tell their constituents how terribly concerned they are about military expenditures, how terribly concerned they are about the deficit, let us just leave them with a little reminder: Here is a weapons system that apparently has alternatives, again as considered by experts within the military field, that are far cheaper and can do the mission as well.

Here is a weapons system that has never found its unique mission for this unique price tag of some $40 billion.

Here is a weapons system that is so expensive that many people have speculated you will never put it on the front lines because you could not afford to lose it.

Let us match this weapons system and the $38 billion increase in the Defense budget alone this year and let us remember that social spending was dramatically cut.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MILLER of California. And then let us match that against the rhetoric for a balanced budget, because $18 billion of that increase is being charged off to some portion of that deficit.

I would hope that people would consider that perhaps maybe the questions of a balanced budget, the questions of forcing people to pay for these systems as we vote for them, that these kinds of questions perhaps will be the greatest constraint on the madness of those individuals who have been in the Brahmin class in the budget system, a system of the Pentagon, to force them to look at realistic defense requirements of this Nation so that we can have a first-class defense system, not a gold-plated system.

I would just like to say in closing that there are an awful lot of people who have given lipservice to how dangerous this system is, how expensive this system is, how poorly designed this system is, who are not here today and for that reason I would like to thank very much my colleague, the gentleman from California, for raising this debate.

As somebody said on the other side, I hope he has the tenacity to raise it next year and the year after and the year after, because it is becoming very clear that this system is running out of missions for it to perform and cannot stand the scrutiny nor the spotlight.

I am afraid that this system cannot dance long enough or fast enough for the light that you have put on it.

I would hope that the taxpayers and the people concerned about the defense of this country would start to realize the service that the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) is rendering to this House.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, may I just, for purposes of clarification, ask for a response from the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS)?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. I have in hand a copy of the gentleman's amendment striking, for aircraft, $13,209,900,000. Is that a true copy of the gentleman's amendment? I should say it provides, rather; provides that amount for aircraft. Is that correct?

Mr. DELLUMS. That is right.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. In other words, that strikes 4,900 million-some odd dollars from the total that was $18 billion?

Mr. DELLUMS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly to me?

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding; $3,393 billion for the B–1, $.475 million advanced procurement, $.165 million for spare parts. That comes to the figure the gentleman just quoted, slightly in excess of $4 billion.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the gentleman that on page 400 of the report, the budget request figure cited is $4,033,500,000. So the amendment in its present form proposes to strike more than is provided in the bill.

Mr. DELLUMS. We eliminate $4,033,500,000.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Well, then, that does not reconcile with the remaining amount provided in the gentleman's amendment when he deducts that from the initial amount.

Mr. DELLUMS. Our staff is trying to reconcile the difference at this point.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Let me advise the gentleman that I think we have argued the merits of this case adequately, but I do think it is highly important that we get these figures accurate.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further to me?

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to yield further to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. We are amending the bill, as amended by the Stratton amendment. Does that clarify the confusion?

Mr. HILLIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. That clarifies it. I think it has been useful to have done that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, this is a tempting amendment for me. In my judgment, this Defense authorization bill, H.R. 6030, is too expensive.

The more I listen to the debate, the more I feel that the Department of Defense either does not care much about cost, or is erring heavily on the side of caution and safety. My constituents do care about cost.

I have already voted against purchase of MX missiles until we have an approved basing mode. Despite the fact that Congress will surely approve that buy, I remain unconvinced that the right basing mode will be established this year as predicted.

If we don't have a basing mode for the MX, we probably should not risk cutting out the B–1. If the basing is approved, then I shall vote against the B–1 in the future. Ideally, I prefer the MX to B–1, but that choice was not available today.

I don't see how we can afford the expense of all these major programs. At some point, we must make some discriminatory choices. Both the MX and the B–1 are not heavy expense items in this year's budget, but in the out-years, when full production and deployment take place, costs escalate quickly. The out-years are where the fiscal problem is.

I am extremely frustrated by our general inability to make the hard choices. The systems are complicated. They have different purposes. It is nearly impossible for a person who has not followed these matters on a regular basis in the committee to make rational choices.

I do know, however, that we cannot, especially at this time, continue to approve expenses at these rates. If the Department of Defense and the committee will not help us to achieve some control, the only way I can express my discontent is to vote against the whole bill.

If this bill is not reduced, I shall do so, and that note will reflect my frustration about the B–1, as well as the MX basing mode, the two nuclear carriers, the unmothballed battleships, and dozens of other systems, programs, and weapons of lesser prominence.

I want a strong defense, but I am alarmed by the fiscal peril which seems inevitable under current policies. Big programs like MX or B–1 are really not much different from entitlement programs. They are certain to grow enormously in cost year after year, even in the unlikely event that cost estimates are attained.

Finally, another cost that distresses me is the burgeoning expense of our military pension system. Neither the Department, nor the committee, nor anybody has looked at this program with a critical eye. At the current growth rate of costs, by the time someone takes the time to renew and reform the military pension system, it may be too late.●

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, the B-1, and particularly the B-1B, is not a military bomber. It is a political bomber. It owes its resurrection not to national security requirements, but to the Reagan administration's rigid and dogmatic devotion to it. The president of Rockwell International, the plane's manufacturer, boasts that he has framed on his wall the stub of his 1980 Presidential election ballot, with which he voted for Ronald Reagan. He had good reason to vote this way; he knew that the election of Ronald Reagan would assure the resurrection of the B-1, regardless of its demerits, deficiencies, and defects.

Let us start from the basic fact that nuclear deterrence is enhanced by a fleet of recallable weapons which take several hours to reach their targets, and which can take off quickly to escape destruction in a Soviet strike.

We find four basic routes to this capability.

First, there is the B-70 solution: A small number of high-flying, supersonic, manned vehicles with a very large radar cross section. This concept was supported during the 1960's by the same people who now support the B-1. But wiser heads prevailed. We realized it would be a sitting duck for Soviet missiles, and it was never put into production.

Second, there is the cruise missile, which is already very impressive and getting better. This approach uses a very large number of low-flying, subsonic, unmanned vehicles with an extremely small radar cross section. This is the answer that works. Everybody knows it will work.

Third, there is the B-1A: Low-flying, supersonic, manned, with a medium radar cross section. Only a few years ago, we were told this was the answer. We were told we were unpatriotic if we did not support the B-1. Nevertheless, we said no, the B-1 will not work. We should not give the Soviets a small number of large targets, because they will shoot them down.

Well, we were right. The same Air Force people who were pushing the B-1A in 1977 are now saying it is just as well we did not build it. The combination of Soviet SA-10's and monopulse air-to-air missiles would be too much for it.

So now we have the political bomber, the B-1B. It is better than the B-1A because it goes part way to meet our criticisms. It gives up the silly supersonic speed in return for a smaller radar cross section. But it still leaves us with a small number of easy-to-spot vehicles, as opposed to the cruise missile's large number of hard-to-spot vehicles.

The Secretary of Defense has admitted that sending the B-1B into the Soviet Union by 1989 would be "a suicide mission." But we will not get the first airplane into service until 1986, and by 1989 we still will not have the whole force. We are planning to spend $200 or $300 million for a strategic weapon with a useful life of 3 years at best, and in many cases, 0 years.

This may make sense to some people who have a political stake in the B-1 bomber. But it does not make sense to me, nor does it make sense for the taxpayers who will have to foot the bill for the B-1B.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BEDELL

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEDELL: Page 8, after line 12, insert the following new section:

LIMITATION ON FUNDS FOR BATTLESHIP REACTIVATION

SEC. 109. None of the funds appropriated pursuant to the authorizations of appropriations in section 102 may be obligated or expended in connection with the battleship reactivation program until sea trials of the U.S.S. New Jersey (BB-62) have been completed and the Secretary of the Navy has certified to Congress that, based upon those sea trials, the ship operates in accordance with Navy specifications and is fully capable of performing its missions.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman as I understand it, the battleship reactivation program serves two very important purposes. The first, is represented in the awesome firepower these ships can muster in support of missions envisioned for the Rapid Deployment Force. The second, and perhaps even more important to U.S. security interests, rests in the battleship's ultimate potential to assume the role of a cruise missile platform for both strategic and conventional warheads.

The reported cost of the reactivation of these four Iowa-class battleships (the U.S.S. New Jersey, Iowa, Missouri, and Wisconsin) is in the vicinity of $1.6 to $1.7 billion—possibly a real bargain, especially considering the fact that these ships can be delivered to the Navy on a more time urgent and cost effective basis than could newer and more specialized ships designed for each mission requirement exclusively. Despite the bargain, however, I question the wisdom of our decision to redeploy "vintage" shipping with newer and more highly sophisticated electronic equipment than these ships have ever been tested or deployed with before.

If these ships are to be used exclusively for fire-support missions for the RDF and are deployed independently of carrier task forces, they will require escort ships to provide them with antisubmarine, antiair and antimissile protection. If the ships are to become cruise missile platforms, the 16-inch guns at the aft of the ship would, in all probability, be replaced with vertical missile launchers and the final reactivation costs could approach $2 billion per ship.

Nevertheless, the Department of the Navy has made a compelling case in favor of battleship reactivation and it assures us of the ultimate compatibility of "big gun" firepower with sensitive electronic missile, radar, and countermeasures technologies. Indeed, Navy officials are so confident of their success in this matter that they inform us of their success on paper even before these systems have been trial tested in conjuction with one another. In this regard, my amendment has one over-riding purpose: To insure that any further investments we make in battleship reactivation are worth their final costs.

Simply stated, my amendment holds all fiscal year 1983 funding for battleship reactivation in abeyance until sea trials on the nearly completed U.S.S. New Jersey are conducted and the Secretary of the Navy has certified to Congress that, based upon those trials, the ship will operate in accordance with Navy specifications and is capable of fulfilling its mission requirements. These trials are now scheduled for late September and October. In my mind, this certification should address three specific areas.

First, while it is certainly true that the Department of the Navy has added "shock resistant" features to the components of the armored box launchers of the Tomahawk and Harpoon cruise missile batteries, neither the ship's guns or its missiles have been test fired, at sea, from the decks of the New Jersey. It is interesting to note that in the past, missile ships equipped with smaller guns have suffered breakdowns in their missile fire control systems after discharging salvos from their 3- and 5-inch gun batteries. How then can we be sure that these problems have been alleviated in the absence of thorough and proper trial testing procedures?

Second, although the New Jersey was outfitted with electronic countermeasures systems during the Vietnam war, the threat to these systems has changed significantly. In Vietnam, the New Jersey was subjected to shore bombardment attacks. In today's environment, however, these ships could face an entire array of conventional arms and sophisticated electronic attacks. It is for these very reasons, that the Navy Department has requested congressional approval for newer, more modern electronic countermeasures systems, modern air and surface search radars and the installation of four Vulcan Phalanx close-in weapons systems for defense against air and missile attacks.

Each of these sophisticated systems is extremely more complicated than any of those deployed during the Vietnam era. And, each of those systems must work in complete harmony with one another if these ships are to be defendable, as well as credible additions to the U.S. arsenal. Nevertheless, we cannot be certain that these systems will operate successfully in a combat environment or in conjunction with the firing of 16-inch guns because they have yet to be tested in coordination.

Finally, each ship will be equipped with aviation facilities including an operation station for one helicopter and parking spaces for three additional aircraft. This facility will be located on the ship's fantail but could be rendered useless as a result of severe over pressures that are created when 16-inch guns are fired. In this regard, three options are available to the ship's captain to prevent possible damage to his helicopters. He can: First, fly them when using his aft guns; second, he can recommend that the Navy obtain funding to build aircraft hangars on the ship's fantail and then ground his helicopters; or third, he can silence his aft guns. This problem has yet to be solved and will not simply go away because we wish it may or refuse to address its solution.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my amendment to be a reasonable proposal. I am not attempting to prevent the deployment of needed naval firepower or the potential use of battleships as cruise missile platforms. I am merely asking the question, "Are these weapons systems truly compatible with one another, especially in a combat environment?" And I am only recommending that before we go ahead with any additional investments in battleship reactivations, we make sure beyond all doubt that these ships will be able to fulfill their intended dual purpose mission requirements without suffering critical breakdowns in their offensive or defensive weapons and electronic systems as a result of firing their 16-inch guns.

To me, there exists only one way in which to accomplish this task. We must hold all fiscal year 1983 battleship reactivation funding in abeyance until the New Jersey's sea trials are completed in October of this year and the Secretary of the Navy has certified to the Congress that each of the potential problems discussed have real solutions. In this manner, Congress clearly demonstrates its resolve to be fiscally responsible while at the same time, providing this Nation with the best defense systems available. Holding these funds in abeyance will also serve another important purpose. After completion of sea trials and reporting to Congress, we, as decisionmakers, will be better able to determine whether or not if there is truly room for 1940's battleships on the sea of the 1980's and beyond.

The American sailor and taxpayer deserve nothing less and the Congress can accept or fund nothing less. For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of passage of this amendment.

□ 1700

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

No. 1, can the gentleman give me an indication of the time delay involved and, No. 2, the dollar increase involved in the time delay?

Mr. BEDELL. We have checked with the Department of Defense. There are no penalty clauses in any of the contracts, so the cost involved is essentially zero. The time delay is that the New Jersey is already ready for sea trials. They expect to have those trials in October. So we are only talking about a few months.

It seems to me that it makes sense to spend a few months to find out what the problems may be before we proceed with these other battleships, one of which, by the way, is the battleship Iowa, the State which this gentleman represents.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment would prohibit obligation or expenditure of 1983 funds for the battleship program ($417.4 million) until New Jersey (BB–62) completes sea trials, and the Secretary of the Navy certifies that the ship operates in accordance with specifications and that it is fully capable of performing its mission.

The amendment is offered because of concern about vulnerability to torpedo and bombing attack, the belief that more small ships might be better, and concern about reports that the use of the big guns on battleships could disable other weapon systems, communications, and radars.

The committee opposes the amendment because it could delay work on reactivation of Iowa and delay procurement of long lead materials for reactivation of Missouri with resultant cost increases and delays in ships joining the fleet.

Reactivation experience with New Jersey during Vietnam demonstrated that ship can operate with modern electronics.

All systems to be installed on New Jersey and subsequent battleships have been successfully installed on other ship classes that carry guns.

All military electronics and weapon systems are tested to operate in an environment more severe than that created by firing guns of battleships.

Battleships are the most heavily armored, least vulnerable ships in the world today.

Battleship reactivation will cost $326 million for New Jersey and about $400 million for Iowa, little more than a new FFG–7 which carries no armor.

I was a late convert to the idea of bringing the battleships on. I pressed the feet of the Navy people when they came to me to ask the committee to go forward with this. I raised every possible objection I could. I was finally sold on the idea because the ship, although it has some things that we do not need, has many things we do need and costs a lot less money to get a lot of power on the sea promptly. Therefore, it is a good buy.

I would like to observe that there is no Member in the House of Representatives I admire more than the gentleman from Iowa. He is certainly a very outstanding leader here and a thoughtful man. I am glad he brought this matter up. But I believe what he desires to be done can be done without his amendment. I will promise the gentleman, if it will be sufficient for him to withdraw his amendment, that we will have a timely hearing, that the gentleman can set the time, we will bring the Navy people before us and be sure, before we go forward with the actual expenditure of this money that these things will be protected.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield, the purpose of the gentleman from Iowa is what I think the gentleman from Florida has indicated. The purpose is simply to be sure of what we are doing before we spend money on the reactivation of these battleships. And if I have the assurance from the committee chairman that he will pursue, to see how the sea trials of the New Jersey go forward, and that he will request of the Department of Defense that they not make commitments that cannot be withdrawn in case there is a problem with some of these matters as they test the New Jersey, in my opinion it would probably be better handled than with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. If the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his amendment, I will agree to the following: First, I will request that the sea trials of the U.S.S. New Jersey be expedited; second, I will hold hearings on the issues raised by the gentleman from Iowa at the earliest possible date after completion of sea trials, and third, I will request that in exercising contract options that the Department of the Navy take all possible steps to protect taxpayers from any avoidable charges as a result of changes necessary as a result of sea trials and hearings. This is not meant to delay the refurbishing of the hull and power systems of the U.S.S. Iowa.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentlewoman from Louisiana.

Mrs. BOGGS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that the gentleman from Iowa is agreeable to having the hearings and withdrawing his amendment until such time as the hearings have been completed.

I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, what timeframe the chairman expects the hearings to be completed in. I ask this for a very specific reason. The retrofitting of the Iowa is going to be done at Avondale Shipyard in New Orleans and at Ingalls Shipyard at Pascagoula, Miss. The timeframe that we had expected to start on the drydock retrofitting on the Iowa was sometime within a September or October timeframe. If it is delayed much beyond that time, it will mean the loss of 1,500 blue collar jobs in my area, and also, of course, would be delaying the active retrofitting of the battleship.

Mr. BENNETT. What time would the gentlewoman like to have the hearings?

Mrs. BOGGS. I think if we could have them as expeditiously as possible it would address the problems that the gentleman from Iowa has, as well as the problems that the gentleman from Louisiana, the gentleman from Mississippi and I have.

Mr. BENNETT. Would some time in the next 30 days be suitable?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL and by unanimous consent, Mr. BENNETT was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. It is my understanding that the sea trials at this time are planned to be in October. It is my further understanding that the contract about which the gentlewoman speaks is an option for October, it would be October that it would either be activated or not. There is no reason that I know of that those sea trials could not be moved up somewhat and that that could not be done prior to that time.

Mr. BENNETT. You say you could do it before October?

Mr. BEDELL. I would certainly think so. But the important thing to the gentleman from Iowa is, if the option is exercised, that an additional clause be added to the contracts, so that if those trials show that indeed there are difficulties that they did not anticipate, that the taxpayers not be unduly penalized for the Government making changes that may be necessary if we find, for example, that the 16-inch guns throw some of the electronic equipment out of operation. Then I am sure the gentlewoman would not want us to proceed with building that we would simply have to tear down and redo.

Mr. BENNETT. We will have a hearing to ask the Navy not to go ahead if something occurred that is detrimental.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman from Iowa could be heard further, it would appear to me that probably the changes necessary are not going to mean that the shipyard has to simply stop any work on the ship.

□ 1710

Mr. BENNETT. What I agreed to is having hearings at the appropriate time to see what should be done in the future, not to stop this legislation. If we are going to do that we ought to vote on the amendment. All I agreed to was having a hearing at an appropriate time to see whether or not things had been discovered that should indicate we should not go forward and have some changes in the contract. I am not going to hold up the going ahead. I am only offering the appropriate hearings at the appropriate time to see whether they should go ahead.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Would the gentleman be willing to request of the Navy that if they exercised the option they adequately protect themselves so that in case work which has not been done should not be done, or should be done differently, would not adversely seriously impinge upon the taxpayers?

Mr. BENNETT. I promise the gentleman I will make that request of the Navy; and I think that really concludes the matter unless there is something else to be said.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I would certainly hope that any hearings held by the Naval Subcommittee would not delay the moving of the U.S.S. Iowa to the gulf coast to proceed on its refitting contract.

I am sure if the Navy finds problems in the U.S.S. New Jersey that proper steps will be made to see that these problems can be solved without delaying the movement of the U.S.S. Iowa to start refitting of the U.S.S. Iowa.

We need to get people back to work, not delay any construction.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, had the gentleman persisted in his amendment, I would have risen in opposition to it. I must object to the delay of the activation of the battleships Iowa and Missouri until trials have been completed on the New Jersey. I do so for a number of reasons which I believe will address some of the criticisms of the battleship activation program.

FIRST, COST TO OUR TAXPAYER

The activation of one of these battleships will only take one-third the time needed to build a new nuclear cruiser and at only half the cost. Using the Iowa as an example, the total costs for reactivation will run just under $412 million. Compare this to the new nuclear cruiser Arkansas which had a price tag of over $1.5 billion and took 5 years to build. In addition, the Navy has experience in battleship reactivation since the New Jersey—which is presently on schedule for its second recommissioning—went through a reactivation in 1967 without any cost overruns.

COMBAT EFFECTIVENESS AND USEFUL LIFE

The Iowa and other Iowa class battleships planned for reactivation will be carrying the modern radar and electronic equipment our new ships carry today. These ships will be part of a battle group with air defense escorts and frontline ships for protection much like our carriers receive today. These battleships will also carry modern, self-contained anticruise missile systems and rapid-fire Phalanx guns systems. These systems will complement an extremely high grade armor plating that is presently unmatched by any vessel in the U.S. Navy. Today's Jane Fighting Ships lists only our Nimitz class carriers as having any armor of consequence. This armor plating is only 2½ inches thick as compared to the Iowa class battleships whose maximum thickness is 17.3 inches. The Iowa class ships also have a 12-inch armored hull which is in fact the fourth hull. Any missile or torpedo must penetrate three separate hulls before reaching the ship's armored hull. These battleships were originally designed to withstand armor piercing 2,700 pound shells which can penetrate 30 feet of reinforced concrete. No cruise missile, let alone the type of missile in action during the Falkland crisis, can come close to matching this destructive force.

Finally, when we are talking about the age of these battlewagons we must look at the actual service life—that is, the time spent in actual operating service. All of the Iowa class battleships average only 10.7 years service life with the Iowa being the youngest in service life with 7.6 years.

Finally, two last points. Everyone talks about the jobs and security that the social part of our Federal budget creates. Many Members say that by reducing funding for various defense programs we can better address our social programs, and, thereby, our unemployment situation. But I contend that we are maintaining our commitment to social needs. Social program spending in the 1983 budget we recently passed surpasses funding for defense by over $135 billion. Just as important, the construction aspects of this defense bill, including the battleship reactivation program, can provide important Federal social services in the form of immediate jobs.

A vote for this bill is a vote to strengthen our naval forces and keep over 1,500 people employed in Louisiana alone. More importantly the reactivation of these battleships will do much to retain 12,000 shipyard jobs throughout the Mississippi and Alabama gulf coast region, and—eventually—create thousands of new jobs for other areas of the country in the near future.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, we will have hearings before some time in October.

Mr. BEDELL. With the assurance from the chairman of the committee that he will have hearings to check and he will request that the Navy proceed to expedite the sea trials of the New Jersey, and further that he will request that the Navy——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL), does he have a unanimous-consent request to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. BEDELL. I would like to get the assurance——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman has struck the requisite number of words a moment ago. Does the gentleman from Florida relinquish his time? The gentleman is not on his own time or anyone else's time.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to withdraw his amendment if there is agreement by the chairman as to what is to be done.,

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have made the assurance. I gave the gentleman the previous statement. I think it covers everything the gentleman wanted.

Mr. BEDELL. It will do three things.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state that the amendment has been withdrawn.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DELLUMS

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DELLUMS: Page 4, strike out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, the practical effect of the amendment before the body is to strike the funds for both of the nuclear carriers, the CVN's. It strikes $6.87 billion for the two nuclear aircraft carriers.

There are a number of points that I wish to make in support of the amendment but prior to marshalling my arguments in support of striking the funds for both of the nuclear carriers, I would like to quote at least in part from two statements made by Adm. Stansfield Turner, one in March of 1981 appearing in the Washington Post, and a second in response to a piece in the op-ed section of the New York Times of June 3, of this year, and finally in the ad hoc hearings that we held which I have alluded to earlier in this debate in the colloquy between my distinguished colleague from California (Mr. BEILENSON), and Dr. Paul F. Walker, one of the members of the Boston study group, and coauthor of the book, "The Price of Defense."

I would begin with the first quote from Adm. Stansfield Turner.

The giant aircraft carrier is a dying breed. At $3.5 billion for one ship—no aircraft—it is too expensive. At 100,000 tons and 1,000 feet in length, it's a sitting duck. With the fleet limited to a total of 12 or 13, they must be carefully rationed, so often they are not where we would like them to be. Like the manned bomber, the trends of technology are all making the giant aircraft carrier obsolete.

The extant cruise missile will permit carrier planes to also stand off and fire at a distant target. The V/STOL, now being used extensively by the Marines and the Soviets, is also a reality. Between the cruise missile, V/STOL and the technology that helps each do its job, the aircraft carrier too can shrink in size and cost, and many more ships can become carriers of at least a few aircraft.

The June 3 article in the New York Times, the second statement by Adm. Stansfield Turner:

TO THE EDITOR:

The Times printed an Op-Ed piece by Kenneth Jungersen [May 21] which erroneously drew the conclusion that the naval battles off the Falklands prove that the U.S. should buy more super aircraft carriers at $3.4 billion each.

The thrust of the argument was that a large U.S.-type carrier could defeat the Argentines in the Falklands easily whereas the small British carriers were having problems.

One has to ask whether we will ever learn not to design weapons for the last war. Any new carriers we decide to build today will not join the fleet until the early 1990's and will be in service well into the 2000's. Judging what would be useful over that span of time by what would be useful today in the Falklands is quite superficial.

Technology is moving too rapidly for such a static outlook. Many of the advantages of large carriers will be overtaken by new technologies. Lighter, smaller aircraft with sophisticated missiles will supersede the big carriers' big aircraft. The vulnerability of all ships will likely increase.

I would repeat for purposes of emphasis, Mr. Chairman, the vulnerability of all ships will likely increase "no matter how many layers of steel one wraps around a large ship."

The quote continues:

More importantly, building a large ship means placing a lot of value in one, sinkable platform. New techniques of reconnaissance will make it easier for an enemy to select the high-value target.

We are in an era when too much value in one ship invites its demise. The most serious problem with that is that the admirals will not commit their big carriers in risky situations when they represent so much value and we then may lose by default.

□ 1720

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to repeat the last paragraph about Adm. Stansfield Turner:

We are in an era when too much value in one ship invites its demise. The most serious problem with that is that the Admirals will not commit their big carriers in risky situations when they represent so much value and we then may lose by default.

Third, Mr. Chairman, I would like to quote briefly from a colloquy between my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON) and Dr. Walker:

Mr. BEILENSON. In your listing there on page 10 of your testimony of some of the recommended fiscal year 1983 deletions, you have the authorization for fiscal year 1983 and then future costs. Under future costs for nuclear aircraft carriers you have the figure $30 billion. What are we talking about there, additional aircraft carriers or the additional cost of the two that are being started now?

Dr. Walker, in response to this question:

The eventual cost of the two.

The aircraft carrier is difficult to be exact on, but the carrier itself is in the range of $3 to $4 billion just to purchase the ship.

If you talk about a Navy wing of 86 aircraft on board and then you talk about several submarines to surround it, protect it, and you talk about several destroyers and cruisers to protect the aircraft carrier and then you talk about a replenishement group of oilers, aviation fuel and supplies to supply the whole fleet, you are talking about over the long run of something in the neighborhood of $10 to $20 billion at a minimum for each aircraft carrier you purchase—$10 to $20 billion for each aircraft carrier you purchase. In this bill we are talking about purchasing two at a cost of $6.87 billion.

What I am saying is really the aircraft carrier is your first buy into a long run of further purchases that you have to purchase once you buy the aircraft carrier, because it cannot protect itself without the fleet.

Mr. Chairman, I would now like to make the following arguments against the backdrop of those statements and I would in so doing try to address two groups of my colleagues in this body, those who oppose a Navy configuration based on large carriers and carrier task forces, and second, those who recognize we can forgo this $6.87 billion expenditure at least this year, because it seems to me that those two coalitions of Members in this body on this floor can come together to challenge these two systems.

The points I wish to make are the following: This is the largest single item in the military budget, the largest single item. Its projected expansion to 15 carrier groups has no military justification, Mr. Chairman. Its only use is a confrontational posture.

There really are only two functions for large nuclear aircraft carriers, political show of force on the high seas and fighting against lightly armed Third World countries.

Mr. Chairman, large carriers are vulnerable. They are sitting ducks in a nuclear war. In a nuclear war, they will draw early and heavy nuclear fire. They have no utility in such an environment.

While the procurement price is $3 to $4 billion each, let us go over this. Carriers require a large armada of ships to protect them. That costs money.

They require replenishment ships for supplies. That costs money.

They require funding for aircraft to carry out missions. That costs additional money.

They require aircraft to protect the rest of the fleet as well as the carrier itself. That costs additional funds.

The real price is billions and billions of dollars per carrier task force. You start with the $3 or $4 billion purchase and suddenly you are into billions and billions of additional dollars because an aircraft carrier cannot float by itself. It cannot function by itself and if you make the carrier the basis of your fleet, you have to build billions and billions of dollars above the ships and planes in order to protect it.

Mr. Chairman, we have always been a sea power as a result of our geography, but there is no way for surface ships to protect the sea lanes in a nuclear war. The large ship on the high seas in a nuclear war, as I said, is a very large sitting duck. It has no use against the Soviet Union in a nuclear confrontation.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, a nuclear carrier has no use in a confrontation with the Soviet Union.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the U.S.S.R. has no comparable ship. The two carriers that the Soviet Union presently has are half the size and they cannot handle jets.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that it is a major travesty for us to purchase two huge nuclear carriers that would act as sitting ducks on the high seas, that cannot function in the atmosphere of a nuclear war, and whatever the force is, I hope it blesses us that we never involve ourselves in the madness and the insanity of a nuclear war, but it is a travesty to spend taxpayers' dollars on such expensive ships which serve only a political purpose at best for showing the flag and are useful only in limited types of war directed at Third World countries. Against the Soviet Union, Mr. Chairman, these weapons serve no useful purpose.

Over the past several months many of my colleagues have marched into the well and argued diligently for conservation in the economics of this country, cutting massively and substantially into social programs in order to offset this incredible massive unnecessary increase in our military budget and here is a figure, $6.87 billion for two nuclear carriers that in my estimation serves no useful purpose.

If we can crush millions of people in this country and remove any commitment to address their human misery in America's 1983 budget, we certainly can crush these two nuclear carriers that serve no useful purpose.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, many things have been said. I will not take as much time as has been used so far in the debate, but I do think it is important to address some of the specific things that have been said.

First of all, it is said that the carriers would be sitting ducks. Well, of course, they are less sitting ducks than any other piece of geography in the world. They may be vulnerable, but they certainly are not as vulnerable as are airplane bases or airports or harbors or any piece of geography elsewhere on the Earth, so they are sitting ducks only in the sense that possibly you might be able to sink them with some kind of a round.

The last few sentences of the gentleman referred to nuclear war. He says they seem to be sitting ducks in a nuclear war. Well, I suppose there would be no part of the world that would not be a sitting duck for a nuclear round. That comment could be addressed to any portion of the world, but that is also true of New York, Paris, London, and anywhere else.

I think the basic thing we have to look at here is the statement made that carriers are not important in 1982 or for the future. Actually, I think anybody who analyzes the military strength of America today if they gave any superiority at all to the U.S. Government in military affairs would have to list the carriers as the only thing that we really have that is outstandingly better than our opponents. I do not know of anybody who observes the military strength of the world who does not give significant value to the carrier force of the United States over and above anything else that we have in our defense; not that other things are not important, but as far as other things are concerned, there are so many numbers aspects that are more valuable to the opponent than ourselves, more tanks, more artillery, more most anything you can mention; but the quality of the aircraft carrier is such that it does give us a distinctive edge and it is probably the only thing that really does give us such an edge in the international situation we have today.

□ 1730

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to observe also that buying two of these carriers together saves $750 million.

I would also like to observe that it does not bring us up to a 15-carrier force; it keeps our present force we have now because we are going to have to take out two of the carriers we have now before the years that these carriers are actually afloat.

So they will just replace carriers now in our fleet.

I would like to point out one other thing before I return to the merits of the carrier, and that is in this bill we have before us today it has already had an amendment offered by myself to take out a Trident submarine in the Navy. That subtracted $699 million. Then there was the Stratton amendment, which took out a large amount of money as well, I am told about $600 million.

Then we had an amendment by Mr. DANIEL which reduced the fleet by 22 ships, and reduced the budget by $248 million.

So you have well over a billion dollars, pushing on $2 billion, cut out of the Navy in this bill already.

We have reduced the number of combatant ships that we have afloat by 22.

We certainly have had a tremendous depletion in the strength of the Navy as a result of all this. Actually, we are going to have fewer ships than we had at the beginning of the year, despite the fact that some new ships are coming aboard. So we have had a very deep cut in the Navy by this bill.

But now returning to the carrier itself and the value of having these carriers, they can be obtained cheaper. We can save $750 million by getting both carriers at the same time.

A lot of things have been said here about a carrier not being able to float by itself. Of course, that was followed up by saying it needs all these submarines and other things around it. Of course those things do help, but they are not essential at all. It depends on what is attacking the carrier.

The carrier is there to attack; it is not there to defend itself. It has many airplanes of different functions upon it which do different things with regard to what is needed, whether protecting the fleet or protecting the ocean lanes or attacking the land bases, whatever it is desired to do.

Furthermore, we have the Aegis ship which can carry things, shooting down things that come into the carrier if it is attacked.

But the gentleman from California makes it sound like the main thing about a carrier is to defend itself. Actually, a carrier is a very offensive weapon and is probably the strongest weapon in the world.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) has expired.

(On request of Mr. DELLUMS and by unanimous consent, Mr. BENNETT was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BENNETT. I was about to conclude, actually, but I appreciate the gentleman's kindness in securing the additonal time for me.

I do want to reemphasize the fact that if there was any one thing one wants to pick out that makes the U.S. defense more valuable and less vulnerable, then that one would probably be the carrier. I think most critiques about strengths of various countries with regard to their relative power, would put the added power in the United States on the basis of the carriers that we have.

Second, we can get them cheaper if we get them together.

Third, we have made very deep cuts already, pushing on $2 billion, in this bill. We have knocked out 22 ships. We have 22 fewer ships than we had 3 days ago; that is, if this bill goes into effect, actual combatant ships of the U.S. Navy.

So we have made terribly deep cuts in the Navy. Let us not make this very unwise signal to everyone throughout the world.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) yield to me?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make three comments. I made three comments on my paper here as I listened to the gentleman speak.

First of all, in a briefing session that I had with Admiral Moorer, Chief of Naval Operations, he stated to me, with staff present, that a nuclear carrier in a confrontation with the Soviet Union in the North Atlantic, its life span would be approximately 15 minutes.

The second point that I would choose to make is—and this is the Chief of Naval Operations saying that a nuclear carrier in a confrontation with the Soviet Union in the North Atlantic would have a life span of 15 minutes. That, to me, is extraordinary vulnerability.

Mr. BENNETT. If it were true, it would be very dismal. But Admiral Moorer is a strong supporter of these two carriers. He told me personally no longer than about 48 hours ago that there is nothing more important to our Navy than to get these two carriers.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I simply make the statement and the gentleman may draw his own conclusions.

Mr. BENNETT. The Admiral still concludes he wants the carriers.

Mr. DELLUMS. My distinguished colleague, the Chair of the subcommittee, indicated that by purchasing these two carriers, nuclear carriers, we save $750 million. My retort to that is that we do it, in my estimation and in my humble opinion, by wasting $6.87 billion.

Final comment: I understood the comment made, which the gentleman made with respect to the function of our carriers. I am simply suggesting to the gentleman that we already have enough carriers in our inventory to do all of the things that the gentleman from Florida seeks to do.

I appreciate my colleague yielding.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. In just a moment, if I may. I want to make a couple of observations, if I may.

There has not been a Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that we have had in the last 30 years that has not recommended at least 16-carrier groups, not 15, not 13, but 16. That is the minimum figure they have always approved. They have never varied from that.

So when the gentleman says that he feels we do not need all these carriers, I am saying we are not even approaching the number of carriers that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have said habitually, without any variation, for the last 30 years, recommended that that is what we really should have.

Now, the gentleman says Admiral Moorer said that the ship would be sunk in 15 minutes. I say to the gentleman I do not buy that. I do not think it is true. We certainly have other evidence before our committee to indicate the fact that they would all be survivable; in fact, the most survivable ships that man has ever made.

It is true that if a carrier had no ability to defend itself, had no planes on it, had no Aegis ship around it, had nothing like that, a single atomic bomb on top of it undoubtedly would take it—it would not take 15 minutes; it would be closer to 15 seconds. That is absolutely true, but it is not going to have those things happen to it. It has the defensive mechanisms around it. It can take many rounds and can receive a lot of damage and still float and still do its job.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the gentleman from California, if I could have his attention: Which Admiral Moorer was this? Thomas Moorer, the former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Chief of Naval Operations?

Mr. DELLUMS. Yes, that is correct. And the gentleman has my undivided attention. I want him to know that.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California made a statement which I would like to ask him about.

Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Soviet Union was not building a nuclear carrier? If that is what he said, that is incorrect.

Mr. DELLUMS. I think I said that its two Kirov class ships are half the size of these carriers and they cannot carry jets.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, my information is that the Soviet Union is building a nuclear wide-decked carrier which can accommodate airplanes equivalent to the F-14.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, has summed up many of the arguments very well, but there are a few points I would like to make and to underscore.

First of all, if we take a look at the necessity of operating large pieces of equipment a very long-distance away from home base, we have to draw the conclusion that a nuclear aircraft carrier is uniquely capable of doing that, not being dependent upon the same oil supplies and supply lines that a conventionally powered ship of any kind is dependent upon.

In fact, intermediate size and large size oil-fired carriers may consume as much as 500 gallons of fuel per mile; whereas, a nuclear aircraft carrier can function theoretically several years at a time without refueling. Of course, there are other pieces of equipment, maintenance and supplies, that have to be supplied, but oil is a major problem and, of course, that is a major consideration.

Second, if we take a look at the recent experience in the Falkland Islands, there are a number of conclusions we must draw.

First of all, if we study the performance of the British carriers, we have to recognize that fixed-wing aircraft, larger size and greater performance, would have functioned more effectively in a variety of circumstances there. Of course, the smaller aircraft carrier that the British used is not capable of carrying the larger, fixed-wing, more high-performance aircraft.

Third, if you take a look at the experience from 1969, you notice that there were six 500-pound bombs that exploded on the flight deck of the U.S. Enterprise. Repairs were made in a relatively short period of time and it was put back into operation.

Also, as I understand, the construction and design of the Nimitz class, it is designed in such a way that there are some 2,000 watertight compartments which are included specifically so that such an aircraft carrier could sustain large and sustained damage and yet still stay afloat.

So, it is not a simple matter of hitting one aircraft carrier with one Exocet missile or something like that and sending it straight to the bottom. Quite the contrary. This ship, more than anything else in the fleet, can survive, for three reasons: First, it is not as vulnerable to damage; the damages can be controlled. Fire damage can be controlled and keep it afloat. Second, because it has the aircraft on board to intercept and defend incoming missiles or aircraft far away and knock down the threat before it can actually strike the ship. Third, as is mentioned in most scenarios, it operates in a carrier task force with other pieces of equipment designed to protect it from submarines, protect it from missiles, protect it from aircraft as well. So, the unit is far stronger than any of the individual components—although the aircraft carrier is certainly the most survivable and strongest ship in the fleet, as the chairman mentioned.

Let me mention one other point. If we are talking about a nuclear exchange, nothing survives. You will kill an aircraft carrier, you will kill anything. If we are talking about a nuclear exchange, then of course all the conventional strategies are of course out the window. We pray that will never happen.

I heard the gentlemen from California talk about his concerns about the insanity of nuclear war and the unreasonableness of expecting to contain a nuclear war to a few weapons exchanges, and I agree with him. He is exactly correct. So, if you follow that point of view and reasoning, you have to come to the conclusion, if you are talking about a nuclear war, there is no sense talking about survivability of the Nimitz or any other ship because it will not survive.

Finally, the issue of the number of aircraft carriers can certainly be debated by reasonable people, but as we approach the end of this century, we are facing another critical problem, and that is the bloc obsolescence of several aircraft carriers. With that bloc obsolescence will come the necessity to rebuild and redesign aircraft carriers to perform that mission. We are facing that problem. This Congress is going to have to decide at some point in the next few years what kind of aircraft carriers we want. In my opinion, it is going to be a mix. We will have large-sized carriers like the Nimitz, and also some smaller aircraft carriers, maybe conventionally powered, but aircraft carriers, nevertheless.

The final point is very important to me and to others who are concerned about cost and cost effectiveness. Recent GAO studies have shown that by buying two aircraft carriers at once, we may save 22 months construction time on each carrier and, at a minimum, three-quarters of a billion dollars for the decision that we will ultimately make, whether we build two of them now or whether we decide on one now and one sometime down the road. I am convinced that if we are going to reinstitute cost effectiveness on shipbuilding, we have to go to a more cost-effective method of procurement by any standard—by any standard, as has been proven as a way to save money and to achieve the ultimate military goal.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

(At the request of Mr. DELLUMS and by unanimous consent, Mr. EMERY was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DELLUMS. I appreciate my colleague yielding, and I would like to respond to the points he made and make several points myself.

The gentleman indicated that a nuclear aircraft carrier is superior by virtue of the fact that it does not have to have fuel ships. The point is that it will be surrounded by a fleet that includes conventional ships, which means they still have to carry fuel. Conventional ships cannot float around with a nuclear aircraft carrier and not have fuel. So, the gentleman's argument does not hold water. It is going to be a fleet and they are going to have conventional forces and are going to have to carry some oil.

Mr. EMERY. If I might respond, it is certainly true that a conventionally powered ship will of course require oil, but not as much. If we are talking about consumption of oil at the rate of some 500 gallons per mile, which of course is the case for an intermediate large-sized craft, we are talking about a greater dependency on more oil. Also, the gentleman realizes that the aircraft carrier will contain some of the resupply equipment necessary for the other ships.

Mr. DELLUMS. But the gentleman will concede that there will be ships floating along with this nuclear carrier that will need their own fuel?

Mr. EMERY. I will concede that is one scenario that is likely, but not absolutely essential under all configurations of the task force.

Mr. DELLUMS. The second point, the gentleman described a scenario where we would have a nuclear carrier task force a significant distance away from its home port. My question would be, what would be the purpose? What would be the purpose of an aircraft carrier fleet that far away from home? Could the gentleman conjure up a reason?

Mr. EMERY. I would say to the gentleman that a primary example would be keeping the shipping lanes in the Indian Ocean open, the oil supply lanes and those strategic supply routes necesary in and around the Indian Ocean.

Mr. DELLUMS. Protect the supply lines from whom? Where is the aggressor?

Mr. EMERY. We assume that the aggressor will be the Soviet Union.

Mr. DELLUMS. It is an assumption.

Mr. EMERY. I think it is a logical assumption, the gentleman will have to concede. I do not think the Argentine fleet is going to be the aggressor.

Mr. DELLUMS. Will the gentleman continue to yield so that we can finish this colloquy?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, I certainly will.

Mr. DELLUMS. If we are talking about keeping the shipping lanes open in the Indian Ocean, and the assumed "enemy" is the Soviet Union, then my response to the gentleman is that I do not believe that you and I can conjure up any kind of conventional exchange between these two major superpowers. What we would really be talking about is a nuclear exchange, and then we are not talking about exploding 500 bombs on the deck of the Enterprise. The point I choose to make is, we are fighting World War II all over again, and I am asking my colleagues to get out of the past and realize that where we are is in a nuclear age, and it is a dangerous and frightening situation. We cannot talk of building ships, hoping that in some way we will engage in a World War II confrontation in the 1982 world.

Mr. EMERY. If I could respond to the gentleman, I hope and pray that we never face a situation where a nuclear exchange occurs, and I know that he agrees with me.

Mr. DELLUMS. Exactly.

Mr. EMERY. And this is a very sincere concern we both share, but let me suggest to the gentleman that if we do not provide any conventional forces at all, then we are left with no option. We are left with the option either of immediately becoming engaged in the very nuclear war the gentleman would like to avoid, or rolling over and watching our national interests and those or our allies being torn asunder without any way to respond.

Mr. DELLUMS. If the gentleman will yield briefly, I would respond to the gentleman by saying, No. 1, we have enough conventional forces to take care of any situation; and No. 2, I think there is a third option. That is an option I have pleaded for on the floor of this Congress. That is, we move into an area of negotiation where we begin to open the communications to move us back away from the brink of disaster.

We talk on the floor of the Congress as if many of us want to engage in war. There has to be a point in time where the human species rises above the absurdity and insanity of war. My definition of war is a military solution to a problem that started out to be either political, social, or economic, or all three or any combination thereof, and it never has ever worked.

It seems to me that we, as human beings, have to rise beyond the madness and insanity of war. There is another option: we can begin to negotiate a peaceful world.

I thank my colleague for the extraordinary opportunity to exchange thoughts with him. Generally, the statements get made on that side and people walk away, but I really appreciate and respect and admire the gentleman for allowing us to enter into this colloquy.

Mr. EMERY. I thank the gentleman, and even though I disagree with many of his views, I respect him and his right to express them in this forum.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. DAN DANIEL and by unanimous consent, Mr. EMERY was allowed to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.)

Mr. EMERY. Let me simply respond to the gentleman briefly and suggest that I, too, believe very strongly that we need to negotiate reduction of nuclear weapons, and hopefully negotiate a balance between the United States and the Soviet Union where a war will not happen. I hope he will join with me and support this administration's initiatives in negotiating the nuclear reduction of heavy weapons as the United States and the Soviet Union are beginning to do now.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. Recently, as time is measured, Mr. Brezhnev said that there were two treasure houses in the world, the mineral treasure house of Africa south of the Sahara, and the fuel treasure house of the Persian Gulf.

His aim was, he said, to deny the resources of those treasure houses to the West.

I think this is why it is so important to follow the policy outlined by the gentleman from Maine. We must keep the sealanes open. Otherwise, and if he is sincere in what he says, and I have no reason not to believe him in this instance, if we do not keep the sealanes open and those treasures are denied the Western World, the Depression which we experienced in the 1930's will fade by comparison.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. EMERY. I agree totally with the gentleman and point out that this is a much smaller world than it has ever been in the past. Whether we like it or not, we are reliant on other nations and other resources.

If we are not willing to defend our access to those and if we are not willing to support our national interests with strong military and the will to survive, the day will come when that depression may exist and we may not have an opportunity.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. BENNETT. Just one brief announcement.

I have been told by the leadership that they would like for us to rise by 7 o'clock. I thought maybe we could end up this by a vote in the near future.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to prolong this debate but I do want to speak in support of the procurement of these two nuclear aircraft carriers.

America today must maintain a powerful naval presence in three oceans of the world. The truth is that we are attempting to maintain that presence in three oceans of the world with a 1½-ocean navy.

Our forces, both people and ships, are stretched to the breaking point. We need more ships and more capable ships and we need those ships today.

Of all of the ships in our Navy, the aircraft carrier is the most capable ship. The carrier permits America to project power and presence around this world.

In this debate the question has been asked what is the role for the aircraft carrier. Ask Margaret Thatcher what the role of the aircraft carrier is today. The British were forced because of a world situation beyond their control to steam their ships into harm's way. They were unable to control the air, and they suffered great casualties.

The British task force did not have adequate air cover. The two small carriers, indeed they were no more than cruisers with a ski jump at the end, had only 20 to 30 Harriers and 10 helicopters. In a similar situation one nuclear aircraft carrier would be able to project more than 100 aircraft at sea.

Furthermore, the two British air carriers had no airborne radar capability. Therefore they had to send a destroyer, the Sheffield, out to act as a sentry for the ships. Of course, the Sheffield was vulnerable and lost to the British.

Contrast, if you will, the British experience in the South Atlantic with our own experience in the Mediterranean and our brief confrontation with the Libyans.

The American Fleet was in the Mediterranean. The Libyans launched over 100 sorties against our fleet. The moment those aircraft left Libyan soil we saw them coming. We dispatched F-14 aircraft from those large deck carriers and they intercepted the Libyan planes well outside their firing range.

Each time the Libyan aircraft turned back but once. On that occasion the Libyans fired on our aircraft and they were immediately destroyed.

Can there be a more eloquent testimony to the value of a large-deck carrier and power projection at sea?

We talked about the budget impact. We are all concerned that we show restraint in the expenditure of public dollars. But by building and buying these two aircraft carriers at once we can achieve substantial economies and, bring those ships to sea 2 years sooner.

Moreover, the budget outlay for fiscal year 1983 is only $235 million, a substantial sum of money, but not the billions of dollars that it will take to acquire these ships. Those sums of money will be paid out over a construction period that will last many years.

For all those reasons, and the reasons advanced by my colleagues today, I believe that we should support the acquisition of these two carriers. They are important to the maintenance of peace and freedom in this troubled world.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will my distinguished colleague yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I realize that we are all getting exhausted here, but I think these are very important issues. I would like to respond to the gentleman briefly.

I think you have made a magnificent statement. You have made a magnificent statement because you have underscored the point, unequivocally, that all we are talking about here is confrontation with Third World countries.

You have alluded to Argentina. We can raise hell with Argentina with a huge nuclear aircraft carrier.

You have alluded to Libya. We can raise hell with a Third World country with a huge aircraft carrier.

The point I am making, in conclusion, is I think that if you and I walked this all the way out we would both agree that we are not talking about some naval battle, conventional naval battle with the Soviet Union, although we always use the Soviet Union as the justification for spending these billions of dollars to build such weapons systems as these two carriers.

If we are talking about Third World countries, and I hope we are not, but your statement was a magnificant statement in that regard, we already have enough forces. So what are we talking about here?

We are not talking about building these ships for a confrontation with the Soviet Union. If we are, I would not like to be on one of those ships in a nuclear confrontation with the Soviet Union.

What are we talking about? Are we talking about floating around to beat up Third World countries?

I hope this superpower is not about that business.

I hope we have learned something from our involvement in Vietnam and our involvement in Korea and our absurd involvement in El Salvador, and that is that it is not our business, and the gentleman has made an eloquent and magnificent statement to make the point that I am making.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TRIBLE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. TRIBLE was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. TRIBLE. May I say briefly we build these ships in order to avoid confrontation with any nation of the world, large or small.

We live in a hard world and America must be strong and vigilant. Weakness only invites trouble as a result of Soviet actions or the action of some other nation in the world.

These ships are important to the maintenance of peace and freedom in this world. Make no mistake about that.

They would add substantially to our ability to deter problems in any scenario, whether that scenario involves the Soviet Union or some other nation.

May this body never place American young men and women in a situation where they must bleed and die because we did not give them the tools with which to defend our freedom.

That is precisely what will happen if we fail to build these important ships.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, but in particular I rise to express my admiration and deep affection for the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS). I have watched him now day after day wage his lonely battle. I want to tell him it is not all that lonely.

I know my constituents hope he wins. We have a lumber depression with 30 percent of my peope out of work and they are praying that he will win and that we will stop this madness, this spending of our money on weapons that bring us greater threats rather than greater national security.

I want to thank the gentleman for his very impressive command of detail, command of concept, command of the facts. He has taken on a host of others and has in my estimation won each and every battle.

I just want to say thank you so much for what you have done.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield to the gentleman from California, surely.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank my colleague very definitely. Just every now and then I do feel alone and I appreciate the fact the gentleman underscored the fact we are not alone. I thank my colleague.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to express my admiration too, for people like CHARLIE BENNETT who I think in their very great minds are doing all that they can to preserve the security of this Nation, and I respect that highly.

I just disagree with them.

I would like to tell my colleagues that I served on an aircraft carrier at the end of the Second World War. It does not make me an expert on it. I loved that carrier. It was the U.S.S. Kitkun Bay, CV-71, one of these little baby flattops, made by Kaiser. Its bulkheads popped open during the storms we went through in the South Pacific. I never flew off the carrier in one of the planes in the squadrons, but I was in admiration of those who did, to get off of that little postage stamp in the rough seas. I was enormously impressed by the pilots who would do that and then come back and try to land on that wobbly field. It was most impressive. The U.S.S. Kitkun Bay took a kamikaze in the Battle of the Philippine Straits and went back into action later. To my mind, the aircraft carrier played if not the key role in the South Pacific in the Second World War, it played one of the major roles in our great victory there.

But I agree with my colleague, the gentleman from California, that we are thinking about fighting either the last war or we are thinking of fighting Third World countries, because any confrontation with the Soviet Union, as unfortunate as it may be, would, without question, escalate into nuclear war, and we have adequate carriers, 13 of them, for any problems we may have with Third World countries. There was no British carrier to go to the Falklands except the Hermes.

So I analyze these carriers, and what I see is that, with all of the ships surrounding them, with much of their squadron built to defend attacks against them, it appears to me that it is a weapon built to defend itself. It actually is a weapon built to defend itself. It may make somebody feel wonderful to see all of that massive strength, but it is like a prizefighter with massive strength who only develop his muscles to make sure that he does not strike himself.

So I ask, on behalf of my constituents who are out of work because of high interest rates and because of massive Government deficits, that we recognize that these aircraft carriers are weapons built only to defend themselves and we stop and examine all of the other arguments, the very excellent arguments made by the gentleman from California to all of the other proposals put forth as to why we need these carriers, save ourselves these billions of dollars, the $18 billion that the carrier and its force and everything else, the squadron, costs. I have heard everything ranging from $10 to $18 billion that the entire flotilla costs. So I ask the Members to vote for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 83, noes 303, not voting 48, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CONYERS

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONYERS: Page 2, strike out line 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For missiles, $2,398,900,000".

Page 3, strike out line 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For missile programs, $1,967,500,000".

Page 4, strike out lines 6 and 7.

Page 6, strike out line 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For Aircraft, $13,209,900,000".

Page 6, strike out line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For missiles, $4,081,000,000".

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me ask the gentleman, since the leadership has asked that we rise at 7 o'clock, would there be any objection from the gentleman if we went through the same procedure we did yesterday? We are anxious to finish this section if we can. I do not want to cut the gentleman off, please understand that, but we have about 30 minutes. Would that be enough time for the gentleman?

Mr. CONYERS. It might be.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I apologize that it is 6:25 p.m.; however, it is not my fault. I did not schedule you to be here until 7 o'clock. Were I in the leadership, you would have left at 4 o'clock, at least.

Before calling for the vote, I might just acquaint you very briefly with what is contained in the amendment that I propose. It tracks a number of nuclear procurement items, armaments and technology.

Some of you may recall the budget debate of a few weeks ago. In this amendment I would recommend for a one year procurement deletion of the Trident submarine program, the Trident I missile, the sea-launch cruise missile, the air-launch cruise missle, the ground-launch cruise missile, the Pershing II missile, the B-1 bomber and the MX missile, a paltry savings of $10.5 billion in the authorizing budget.

Please bear with me. I apologize that this is not a big ticket item as we have become accustomed to over the several days of this debate, only $10½ billion.

Now, I would also like to very immediately distinguish this from the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from California, which was a substitute bill and I would like to identify what was in his bill that is not in this bill. That does not delete this military equipment:

The CVN nuclear carriers, the Aegis cruisers, battleship reconversion, airplanes for new carrier task force, missiles and other support for carrier task force, rapid deployment force, the M-1 tank and the AH-64 helicopter, remain intact.

Notice that the CVN nuclear carriers are excluded from the reach of this amendment. The reason is that they are driven by nuclear energy and do not fall, in my judgment, in the category of nuclear weapons.

So I offer this to those of you, nearly 200, who have responded to calls for antinuclear activity on the part of the Congress. I call not for a freeze, but a 1-year suspension under the terms of this title I procurement, 1-year suspension, not a freeze.

Notice in other titles where R. & D. for nuclear technology and experimentation are involved, we do not touch it, so that we can continue on in our research and development of nuclear weapons. Please understand that very important distinction.

Now, to fully appreciate the premises that underlie this motion, I would like to remind you that President Reagan's budget document of the United States spells out the U.S. defense policies insure our preparedness to respond to, and if necessary, successfully fight either conventional or nuclear war.

Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger testified before our own committees about the need to prevail in nuclear war.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CONYERS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. CONYERS. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger testified before our own committee about the need to prevail in nuclear war.

The idea of nuclear war fighting is now central to the U.S. war plans. Winning a nuclear war and defeating the Soviets and defeating the enemy in nuclear battle, I think, is no longer possible.

Mr. Chairman, winning a nuclear war and defeating the Soviets is a pipedream. I say that hesitantly, because neither we nor they can win a nuclear war.

Now, it is funny that this statement has been made time and time again by both Democrats, Republicans, those for building up and accelerating the military build-up, those for cutting it down, but I am not sure if we really understand that. The fundamental truth of military affairs today, although it is a bitter pill to swallow, particularly for military men and Congresspersons, is that the traditional role of the military in all countries is to prepare to win. The military profession has always sought superiority, understandably.

Military men are understandably uncomfortable with notions of balance and equilibrium, but the fact is that neither we nor they can win a nuclear war.

But we do not proceed on this 1983 authorization budget title I, procurement, on that basis. Some military leaders have spoken to this. Lord Mountbatten, shortly before his death—one of the greatest, distinguished, military officers in Britain's history—said long ago:

As a military man who has given half a century of active service, I say in all sincerity that the nuclear arms race has no military purpose. Wars cannot be fought with nuclear weapons. Their existence only adds to our perils because of the illusions that they have generated.

What he did not say is that the sole purpose of nuclear weapons is deterrence. A proposition that many of us subscribe to is that neither we nor they can win a nuclear war, although we do support the premise and the notion that we contain nuclear weapons in our arsenal because of their deterrent capability and potential. I subscribe fully to that notion.

I bow to no one, man or woman, on the notion of America's national security and the need for its preeminence. So, I support these preparations, but to fight and win a nuclear war is central to this entire bill. I must disagree with those premises and, therefore, seek to strike the nuclear armaments that would go forth under title I.

The fiscal year 1983 military budget is simply a nuclear war budget and I think we should not only not make any mistake about it, but be candid enough to admit it to ourselves and to the American people.

The funding for strategic nuclear forces would climb somewhere about 43 percent, twice as fast as the spending for conventional forces.

The implication of recognition that we cannot and should not be prepared to fight and win a nuclear war goes even further than just the notion of a nuclear weapons program in the new budget. Most of our conventional forces are planned for war with the Soviet Union. I submit that any war that is started with the Soviet Union or that they start with us is going to become a nuclear war.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. DAN DANIEL and by unanimous consent, Mr. CONYERS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the floor manager, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CONYERS. Yes, I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was kind enough to give us a copy of his proposed amendment, but it was just prior to its being offered and we have not had a chance to study it.

I ask the gentleman what this includes. This would take out all money, if I understand it, for nuclear weapons, which would include the sub-launched cruise missile, the air-launched cruise missile, the Pershing II, the MX, the ground-launched cruise missile, and the B-1.

Would that be correct?

Mr. CONYERS. Let me say to the gentleman, first of all, I delivered a copy of the amendment to the chair where he is sitting now, to the person who was sitting in the chair when he was not there. I apologize if he did not get it.

Mr. DICKINSON. No, what the gentleman did, he gave it to me, and I appreciate his consideration. But it was only a matter of minutes before it was offered.

All it does is have a list of numbers being changed. I do not know what is being affected.

Mr. CONYERS. If the ranking minority leader would trace those number to the pages and line numbers in the bill, it will identify it. I read it once, but I will read it again with pleasure.

I do not yield at this point.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman need not bother to read it.

Mr. CONYERS. I am going to do it anyway. I am going to give it to the gentleman whether he wants it or not.

The Trident submarine program, $2.485 billion.

The Trident I missile, $816.1 million.

The sea-launched cruise missile, $285 million.

The air-launched missile, $622.7 million.

The ground-launched cruise missile, $520.1 million.

The Pershing II missile, $508.6 million.

The B-1 bomber, $4 billion.

The MX missile, $1.2 billion.

That totals roughly in savings, $10.5 billion.

Now, as I was saying, I submit that any war that is started with the Soviet Union, if it is a conventional war, will turn into a nuclear war. Once started it is almost inevitable. Neither we nor the Russians will permit the other side to get the upper hand in a battle. Therefore, escalation is inevitable.

The Supreme Allied Commander in Europe recently stated that he believes that there can be no such thing as a limited nuclear war, that the use of theater nuclear weapons would, in fact, escalate to the strategic level very quickly.

The Reagan administration budget presentations are filled with rhetoric about imminent war and deadly peril.

Now, if you believe that we can fight and win a nuclear war with the Soviet Union and that such a war is looming on the horizon, then one might plausibly support the new military budget.

If you think we are going to war tomorrow and we are planning to fight a war with the Soviet Union, I would concede that there is some logic to the extraordinary dimension of this budget.

If, however, you do not believe that we can win a nuclear war with the Soviets or anybody else, and if you do not believe that war is around the corner, then you may sensibly exercise your own judgment on this budget.

My view is that the country does not face the kind of national emergency that the budget alleges. Tragically, however, the budget might contribute to the creation of that very emergency which we fear. Of course, some of the rhetoric is typical of the oversell that we get from the Pentagon. There is no one here who is not used to it. In order to get support for their buildups they believe that they must deliver their message dramatically. While I do not doubt their sincerity, I do question their wisdom.

We could quite safely adopt this suspension on the possession of nuclear weapons in title I, in the procurement area. I want to say that the United States has upward of 30,000 nuclear weapons, if the discussions I have heard in the last 3 days are correct.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I have the time, sir.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has reserved the right to object.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. I reserve the right to object. I do not object. I simply rise in opposition to the amendment and I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state the gentleman from Virginia has reserved the right to object. He is recognized.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. If that is not in agreement with the gentleman from Michigan, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONYERS. I have asked unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the floor manager for any comment he would like to make.

Now, if I understand the debate of the last 3 days and nights, the U.S. military has a capability of upward of 30,000 nuclear weapons, about 12,000 of which may be exploded upon the Soviet Union—far more than a sufficient amount to destroy the Soviet Union even if they strike first. I remember the gentleman from Alabama in a colloquy with the gentleman from Oregon saying that about 500 would be the adequate number.

So, I conclude that this is far more than the sufficient amount necessary to destroy the Soviet Union. If all the nuclear weapons requested in this bill, and those projected over the next 5 years were to occur, we would end up with thousands and thousands of additional weapons. I argue simply, ladies and gentlemen, that this amendment taking the nuclear technology out of procurement to the modest sum of $10 billion for a period of 1 year, continuing research and development, would continue the strength of our national security and would in no way impair our power or our nuclear and conventional strength throughout the world.

But, why do we persist in this contradiction? The reason that this simple proposition has not been embraced is that the false assumptions of the arms race have been accepted by most people, including some who even favor disarmament. They accept the premise that more weapons mean more security, that alternative systems of security that are not based on making hostages of hundreds of millions of people are utopian, and that survival of the United States as the No. 1 actor in the world justifies the activity that leads to the generation of $1.7 trillion of military over the next 5 years.

We have not been able to generate the passion that is required to rid the world of arms because we are psychologically dependent upon them. Any one who ponders the elaborate system that we have erected must realize and can understand why a growing number of scientists state flatly that if an arms race continues now nuclear war is inevitable.

So, I offer again this amendment to suspend nuclear procurement technologies for 1 year, and urge your kind and careful consideration of it.

I thank you for your consideration at this late hour.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope that we can vote. I think all of these issues have been discussed thoroughly throughout the last 3 days, and I hope we can go to a vote now.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 21, noes 355, not voting 58, as follows:

□ 1900

Mr. CORCORAN and Mr. COUGHLIN changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, we have been busy in hearings with the Appropriations Committee, and I understand I am recorded as having voted to eliminate the carriers. That vote was by accident. I have supported the carriers through the years. I think our only chance is to prevent war.

So I would like the record to show that the vote was by accident, and that I support the carriers, as I always have.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to announce that, so far as the Committee is concerned, there will be no other recorded votes tonight.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VOLKMER

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLKMER: Page 4, line 9, strike the figure "$6,795,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$3,595,300,000".

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the last read figure in the amendment from $3,595,300,000 to $3,283,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, just a couple of votes back we voted on whether to eliminate both of the aircraft carriers, as proposed by the gentleman from California.

I personally feel that we need to have one additional carrier on line, and that is what this amendment does. It allows for continuation of the program to one carrier, not two.

I look at the total defense budget and the total budget, and I find that we cannot find everything we would like to have. As we look through it, it is not just a question of philosophy of armament and whether we have the nuclear weaponry, et cetera, but there are a lot of things that we need to cut back, as we are cutting back elsewhere.

We must recognize that when we take the money to pay the shipyards for making these aircraft carriers, we are going to have to go out on the private markets and borrow that money. As you borrow that money, you are going to continue to increase the interest rates. This is your chance to reduce the borrowing by a little over $3 billion and, hopefully, we can then know and we can tell all of the financial markets that we are not going out there and borrow these additional funds.

On the question of whether we need the second carrier at this time, as you all know, it will be some time before these carriers are constructed and utilized into the fleet. In the meantime, we will still be ahead of the Russian Navy. Everybody seems to be concerned about the question of Russia and the United States and whether or not we have superiority or they have superiority. There is no question that at the present time and in the near future, as far as nuclear carriers, we will continue to have superiority, even with one additional carrier provided instead of two. Therefore I feel that, in the sense of economics and the sense of efficiency in spending the money of the taxpayers wisely, we would be better off to only fund the one carrier at this time and postpone the funding of the second carrier to a later time.

For that reason I offer the amendment, and I urge the Committee to adopt my amendment.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this matter has been discussed thoroughly. I believe everybody knows what it entails. I would hope that we could take the vote at this time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER), as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to title I? If not, the Clerk will designate title II.

Title II reads as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. VENTO) having assumed the chair, Mr. AUCOIN, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6030) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1983 for the Armed Forces for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, and for operation and maintenance, to prescribe personnel strengths for such fiscal year for the Armed Forces and for civilian employees of the Department of Defense, to authorize appropriations for such fiscal year for civil defense, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority leader the program for the balance of the day and the balance of the week.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. The committee has risen and that concludes our business for today, but tomorrow, after meeting at 10, we will take up H.R. 2329 concerning the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma. That is 1 hour open rule. We want to complete that bill tomorrow.

We want to adopt two rules: One on the Airport and Airway Improvement Act, and one on the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act.

Then we begin debate on the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act. That is 1 hour with an open rule.

I think it has been generally agreed, however, that we will simply do the general debate on that bill tomorrow and will not complete it.

That is the program for Friday and we will rise at 3 o'clock on Friday.

On Monday the House meets at noon. Monday is District Day, and there are no District bills scheduled. We have at least one bill on suspension, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Then we will complete general debate on the Airport and Airway Improvement Act and the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act.

On Tuesday, we will vote on suspensions. If there are any recorded votes required on suspensions considered Monday, we will take those on Tuesday.

Then we will consider under suspension of the rules the following bills:

H.R. 6782 Disability Compensation and Survivors' Benefits Amendments. That is reported from the Veterans Affairs Committee pursuant to reconciliation instructions.

We will vote on the Export Administration Amendments Act and the Export Trading Company Act. Those are under suspension of the rules. We will then resume consideration of the Defense Department authorizations.

It is hoped that we would complete that on Tuesday. If we are not able to complete that on Tuesday, we would take it up first thing Wednesday after coming in at 10 o'clock and would plan to stay in session Wednesday, however long it might take until we had completed the Defense Department authorizations bill.

After that is done, during whatever remains of Wednesday and the balance of the week, we would complete consideration of the Airport and Airway Development Improvement Act and the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act. We would complete the consideration of the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act, and in the time remaining next week we would hope to take up the Job Training Partnership Act, military construction authorizations, and House Joint Resolution 521, calling for nuclear weapons freeze and reductions, and approval of SALT II agreements, subject to the granting of a rule.

That is a full plate, but we have that much that remains to be acted on and any or all of that might be concluded next week.

Mr. MICHEL. I gather from the scheduling of the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act next week, following general debate tomorrow, that there are amendments anticipated to that legislation; is that correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; if the gentleman will yield further, there are amendments anticipated. That is a bill that was jointly referred to another committee and I am advised that amendments will be offered, not tomorrow, but when we get to it next week.

Mr. MICHEL. We would simply rise after general debate?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

To make sure we understand the schedule for tomorrow afternoon, were debate on the rule and general debate on Radio Broadcasting to Cuba to be completed before 3 o'clock, would we then adjourn before 3 o'clock or would it be the intent to go into the amendment process until 3 o'clock?

Mr. WRIGHT. If we have completed all the business that has been scheduled for tomorrow—and that includes the general debate on the Radio Broadcasting to Cuba Act and does not include action under the 5-minute rule or amendments—prior to 3 o'clock, then we would adjourn.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the majority leader.

VIOLATIONS OF AGREEMENTS CONCERNING SHIPMENT OF AMERICAN ARMS TO COUNTRIES IN MIDDLE EAST

(Mr. FRANK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion recently about possible violations of some of the agreements under which American arms are shipped to other countries in the Middle East. One apparent very serious violation which has not received sufficient attention concerns the transshipment of American arms by Saudi Arabia to the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Israeli troops in Lebanon have discovered large caches of American weapons originally shipped to Saudi Arabia in the arms depots maintained by the PLO.

This is indeed a very serious violation of American law and is an action that greatly undermines the American policy in this area. We have been told for years by several administrations that the Saudis are the moderates in the Middle East and that arms sales by the United States to them will strengthen the cause of peace in that troubled region. Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more destructive to the cause of peace in the Middle East than the arming of the PLO, and yet we now know that the Saudi Arabians have engaged in exactly this practice with American arms.

Even more distressing, Mr. Speaker, is the apparent tendency of our State Department to ignore this fact. On September 10, 1981, I wrote to then Secretary, Alexander Haig, asking him to comment on reports that the Saudi Arabians were sending American arms to the PLO. On October 29, 1981, I received a response from Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations, Richard Fairbanks, stating "after careful examination we have found no evidence that the Saudis have shipped any U.S. supplied military equipment to either Iraq or the Palestinians." Mr. Speaker, Assistant Secretary Fairbanks' response to me now seems to have been incorrect. And I now ask the State Department to take appropriate action to deal with this serious violation of American arms policy represented by the Saudis transshipment of American arms to the PLO. It is precisely this sort of support for the PLO which makes peace in the Middle East a dream rather than the reality that so many of us hope it will be.

I am asking the State Department by letter today to explain to me how they were misled by the Saudis on this critical subject and equally important, to tell the American people what assurances we can have that there will be no further examples of American arms being sent by the Saudis—or any other nation in the Middle East—to be used by the PLO in their campaign against the existence of Israel and against the interests of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I wish, at this point, to share with my colleagues the relevant documents involved. I wish to call their attention, in particular, to my letter to Secretary Haig of September 10; Assistant Secretary Fairbanks' response to me on October 29; the recent statement by Douglas Bloomfield, Legislative Director of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, concerning the discovery of American weapons in PLO camps; and a letter from me to Secretary of State Shultz asking him to take immediate remedial action with regard to this matter.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 10, 1981.

ALEXANDER M. HAIG,
Secretary, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Two recent press reports from the Middle East refer to the transfer of arms, possibly American made, from Saudi Arabia to the Palestine Liberation Organization. Should these reports be true, I believe the United States has a responsibility to take immediate and effective action to strongly protest the arms transfer, and further, to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent any arms transfers to the Palestine Liberation Organization in the future.

Specifically, I refer to a report in the August 6, 1981 edition of MA'ARIV, the Israeli daily, that "Saudi Arabia has been transferring U.S. arms it received within the framework of arms deals with the United States to the Iraqis and to the terrorists in Lebanon." (FBIS, Aug. 7, 81, I 19)

And the radio broadcast on Israel Domestic Service on August 4, 1981 that "* * * Saudi Arabia was helping the terrorists exploit the cease-fire by shipping them fresh supplies of weapons * * *" (FBIS, Aug. 4, 81, 0500 GMT broadcast)

I welcome your prompt reply to the concerns I have raised by referring to these alarming press reports.

Thank you for your cooperation.

BARNEY FRANK.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., October 29, 1981.

Hon. BARNEY FRANK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FRANK: The Secretary has requested that I respond to your letter of September 10, 1981, regarding alleged Saudi shipments of U.S. arms to Iraq and to Palestinian organizations in Lebanon.

As you indicate in your letter, these reports originated in the Israeli press. We have discussed the question at some length with the Israeli government, which does not contend that the Saudis have shipped U.S.-origin equipment to the Palestinians. We have also carefully investigated the charges that the Saudis have shipped U.S. equipment to the Iraqis.

After careful examination, we have found no evidence that the Saudis have shipped any U.S.-supplied military equipment to either Iraq or the Palestinians. The Saudi government is well aware of the significance we attach to the commitments they have made to us regarding third-party transfer of such materials, and we are satisfied that they have made every effort to adhere to them. We have, nevertheless, pointed out to both the Saudis and the Israelis the fragility of the Lebanese cease-fire, and stressed the danger that any new deliveries of heavy weapons to either side would pose to the peace of that troubled country.

I hope I have satisfied your concerns. Please let me know if I can be of further assistance.

Yours sincerely,

RICHARD FAIRBANKS,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

STATEMENT OF DOUGLAS M. BLOOMFIELD LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR AMERICAN ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

During my visit to Israel and Lebanon, I saw tens of thousands of captured weapons. Tanks, cannon, rockets, launchers, rifles, handguns and ammunition of every conceivable kind and size. They were predominately Soviet, but of other origins, as well. I saw dozens of crates of unopened Soviet-made Kalachnikov Assault Rifles shipped via Benghazi, Libya, or directly from the USSR; they had packing instructions as well as operating directions in English. I brought back the service manual for the Soviet AKMS machine gun. I also saw hundreds of U.S. - made M-16 rifles, many of them in their original shipping cartons with labels showing they were originally sold and shipped to Saudi Arabia; they had been transferred to the PLO. There were over 1,000 new West German G-3 assault rifles, one of the best in the world. I also saw Chinese-built anti-aircraft guns and cannon, plus more arms from Vietnam, Korea and the Soviet Bloc. There were even guns used by the Nazis in World War II.

Some of those anti-aircraft guns were attached to many types of vehicles, from Dodge pick-up trucks to Toyotas to Chinese trucks. Then there were the night sights, handguns, grenade launchers, RPG's and Katyusha rockets. Many of the grenade launchers were stamped in English, "Made by Fatah." Fatah is the main branch of the PLO and is Arafat's own organization. Ironically, only a relatively few pieces of the Soviet and Chinese arms had markings in Arabic; most were in English.

There was also the other equipment, like the uniforms, boots, trophies for auto mechanics, typewriters, a Bell and Howell tape recorder and a fully-equipped listening lab.

It has been estimated that the Israelis have captured enough material to equip a very large army. One Israeli officer told me, "We captured them at 5 minutes to 12. They were starting to build a huge army with soldiers from all over the world."

Indeed, Israel reported it captured PLO soldiers from Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Libya, Iran, Korea, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Turkey, Abu Dhabi, Algeria, Sudan, and Senegal and Niger.

Weapons were found everywhere. In mosques, schools, homes, public buildings, caves and underground bunkers—even U.N. offices. At an UNRWA Vocational Training School in Sidon, Israeli troops found stores of weapons, ammunition, training materials, and audio-visual lab and the personal office of Yassir Arafat with his picture on the wall flanked by a Swastika.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 22, 1982.

GEORGE SHULTZ,
Secretary of State,
Department of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have been very distressed to read recently of the discovery by Israel of American arms, originally supplied to Saudi Arabia, which were stored in PLO depots in Lebanon. Clearly, it is a very serious violation of both American law and American interests for the Saudi Arabians to have shipped these weapons to the PLO.

Last year, the State Department denied to me that such transshipments were taking place. Information supplied to me is that unopened boxes of U.S. made M-16's originally shipped to Saudi Arabia have definitely been found by the Israelis in Lebanon. For example, I have been given a list of serial numbers from 6 of the rifles captured from the PLO. These rifles were in their original cartons and were manufactured by the Colt Company and shipped to Saudi Arabia. The labels read: 1005-00-073-9421, Rifle, M16A1, 5.56mm W/E (1 Each), DAA Fo3-71-C-003, 5/76, Serial Nos. 05-354-823, 05-354-301, 05-354-043, 05-354-189, 05-354-145, 05-353-098.

I would very much appreciate hearing from you what we know about this Saudi activity in sending weapons to the PLO and, more important, what steps we are taking to prevent its recurrence. I am sure you agree with me that it is a very serious problem for us to have American weapons shipped in defiance of our law and our policy in the Middle East to an organization bent on violence such as the PLO.

BARNEY FRANK.

INTRODUCING THE NATURAL GAS FAIR PRICING ACT

(Mr. YOUNG of Missouri asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today the Natural Gas Fair Pricing Act. The experience of many of my constituents last winter led me to take a long, hard look at the history of natural gas prices under the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (the NGPA). We all know that homeowners and businesses throughout the country have made tremendous efforts to conserve energy since 1978. Despite continued conservation efforts, last winter's natural gas bills skyrocketed.

For the most part, these increases resulted from substantially higher costs per unit of natural gas consumed—not from increased consumption itself. For example, one of my constituents reported to me that his cost per therm increased 30.1 percent in just 1 year, from January 1981, to January 1982. During the same period, the Consumer Price Index increased only 8.4 percent.

The effect of the NGPA on natural gas prices has been, to say the least, startling. The prices paid to natural gas producers have increased 150 percent since November 1978. To date, this has meant for residential consumers an almost 70-percent increase in natural gas prices for heating and cooking.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the natural gas producer is entitled to a fair price for the gas he supplies. But I also believe that residential consumers should be charged a fair price for natural gas used for heating their homes and that businessmen should be charged fair prices for natural gas used for heating their plants and stores and for operating their machines.

Under the NGPA, however, natural gas prices will continue their rapid rise without regard to the legitimate interests of consumers. The NPGA provides that the prices for 50 percent or more of natural gas production will be decontrolled beginning in 1985. Prices for this gas will not be determined by free market forces. Instead, the OPEC cartel will in large part determine what a homeowner or businessman in St. Louis, Chicago, or Boston will pay for natural gas produced here in the United States. There will continue to be a massive transfer of wealth from consumers of natural gas to the producers.

What I propose will be fair to everyone—consumers and producers. The Natural Gas Fair Pricing Act eliminates the automatic upward price adjustments built into the NPGA and repeals those provisions providing for decontrol of large volumes of natural gas. There is no price rollback in the act. Instead, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission is given authority to permit just and reasonable increases in the prices of all categories of natural gas. These increases must be just and reasonable for the consumer as well as the producer and cannot be based on the cartel-set prices of other commodities such as oil.

As you know Mr. Speaker, I introduce H.R. 6531, the Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act on June 3. The principal purpose of H.R. 6531 is to give natural gas consumers some relief from escalating prices between now and the end of 1984 by eliminating the NGPA's automatic inflation adjustment. If H.R. 6531 becomes law, a natural gas pricing crisis during the winter between now and 1985 will be much less likely. H.R. 6531 is a stopgap measure which will allow Congress to develop a sound long-term solution to the natural gas pricing problem. In my view, Mr. Speaker, the Natural Gas Fair Pricing Act is the type of long-term solution we should work toward.

Mr. Speaker, the time for us to act to protect the American consumer of natural gas is now. I urge my colleagues to give their prompt and favorable attention to the Natural Gas Fair Pricing.

NATURAL GAS FAIR PRICING ACT—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

The bill provides that the short title of the legislation is the "Natural Gas Fair Pricing Act" (the "Act").

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

Section 2 of the bill sets out the Congressional findings supporting the legislation and the purpose it is intended to achieve. In general, Congress finds that natural gas prices have escalated rapidly since enactment of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (the "NGPA"), indeed much more rapidly than the Consumer Price Index. Additional natural gas price increases built into the NGPA will cause severe economic dislocations and hardship for individuals and businesses who consume natural gas for essential residential, commercial, agricultural and industrial uses. Decontrol of prices for substantial quantities of natural gas which is scheduled to begin in 1985 under the NGPA will result in a windfall for natural gas producers through an enormous transfer of wealth from consumers to producers. Under decontrol, natural gas prices will in large part be determined by the international cartel which has controlled world petroleum prices with substantial success. Decontrol of natural gas prices will have serious adverse economic effects, and will not significantly stimulate drilling activity and natural gas production.

The bill is intended to maintain stable markets for natural gas by establishing a mechanism for determining maximum lawful prices. The bill initially sets prices at NGPA levels and gives the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (the "Commission") authority to set different, just and reasonable prices for natural gas based directly on costs of production. This authority substitutes for the automatic price escalators presently in the NGPA.

CONTINUATION OF PRICE CONTROLS

Section 3(a) of the bill repeals subtitle B of title I of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §§ 3331-3333). Under Section 121 of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3331), prices for several categories of natural gas are scheduled to be decontrolled beginning January 1, 1985. Under the bill, there will be no such decontrol; instead, natural gas prices for these categories of natural gas will continue to be determined in accordance with the NGPA, as amended by the Act. Section 122 of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3332) gives the President and Congress standby authority to reimpose price controls. Since the bill eliminates the scheduled decontrol of prices under the NGPA, such standby authority is no longer needed. Section 123 of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3333) requires the Department of Energy to prepare two reports to the President and each House of Congress in anticipation of decontrol of prices for certain categories of natural gas. Under the bill, there is no longer any need for these reports.

The repeal of subtitle B of title I of the NGPA is subject to Section 6(a) of the bill. Section 6(a) makes clear that prices for natural gas produced from a well the surface drilling of which commenced on or before the date of enactment of the Act are not affected by the bill if such prices have been decontrolled pursuant to the NGPA prior to the date of enactment.

Section 3(b)(3) of the bill amends Section 101(b)(9) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3311(b)(9)) to eliminate the reference to decontrolled natural gas prices in connection with the privision dealing with the effect of the maximum lawful prices under the NGPA on contract prices for the first sale of natural gas.

Sections 3(b) (5) and (6) of the bill eliminates the provisions in Section 507 of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3417) dealing with the reimposition of price ceilings by the President and Congress. The scheduled decontrol of natural gas prices and necessarily the authority to reimpose price ceilings are repealed by Section 3(a) of the bill.

ELIMINATION OF AUTOMATIC INDEXING

Section 4 of the bill eliminates the NGPA's automatic inflation adjustment factor. Section 4(a)(1) strikes Section 101(a) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3311(a)) which sets out the formula for calculating the inflation adjustment factor applicable to the various categories of natural gas. Section 5(a) of the bill, more fully explained below, insets a new Section 101(a) in the NGPA which gives the Commission authority to set just and reasonable rates for all categories of natural gas.

Section 4(b) amends Sections 102(b), 103(b), 104(b), 105(b) and 109(b) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §§ 3312(b), 3313(b), 3314(B), 3315(b), and 3309(b)) to set new maximum lawful prices for five categories of natural gas. For any month beginning on or after the effective date of the Act, the prices of these categories shall be the maximum lawful price, per million Btu's, for such gas under the NGPA for the preceding month. These maximum lawful prices may be increased only if the Commission determines pursuant to Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) that any such increase is just and reasonable.

The categories of natural gas covered by Section 4(b) are (1) new natural gas and certain natural gas produced from the Outer Continental Shelf (Section 102); (2) natural gas produced from new, onshore production wells (Section 103); (3) natural gas dedicated to interstate commerce on November 8, 1978 and for which a just and reasonable rate under the Natural Act was in effect on that date (Section 104); (4) natural gas sold under intrastate contracts existing on November 9, 1978 (Section 105); and (5) categories of natural gas not covered by Section 102 through 108 of the NGPA (Section 109). The automatic inflation adjustments are eliminated for all of these categories of natural gas. In addition, the maximum lawful price for Section 102 natural gas no longer to be multiplied by the monthly equivalent of a factor equal to 1.04.

Sections 4(c) and 4(d) amend Sections 106(a) and 106(b) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §§ 3316(a) and (b)) to eliminate the automatic inflation adjustment to the maximum lawful prices for natural gas sold under interstate and intrastate rollover contracts. The maximum lawful price for such natural gas shall be the maximum lawful price under the NGPA for the month preceding the effective date of the Act. The price may be increased only if the Commission determines pursuant to Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) that such increase is just and reasonable.

Section 4(e) amends Section 107(b) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3317(b)) to set a new maximum lawful price for natural gas which the Commission has determined under Section 107(c)(5) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3317(c)(5)) is produced under conditions which present extraordinary risks or costs. The Commission has made such determination with respect to natural gas produced from tight sands. For such natural gas, the maximum lawful price shall be the maximum lawful price under the NGPA for the month preceding the effective date of the Act. The price may be increased only if the Commission determines pursuant to Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) that such increase is just and reasonable.

Section 3(f) of the bill amends Section 108(a) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3318(a)) to eliminate the monthly adjustments to the maximum lawful price for stripper well natural gas. For any month after the effective date of the Act, this price shall be the maximum lawful price for such natural gas for the preceding month. The automatic inflation adjustment and the adjustment made by multiplying the price by the monthly equivalent of a factor equal to 1.04 are eliminated This maximum lawful price may be otherwise increased only if the Commission determines pursuant to Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) that such increase is just and reasonable.

JUST AND REASONABLE CEILING PRICES

Section 5(a) of the bill inserts into the NGPA a new section 101(a) (15 U.S.C. § 3311(a)) to give the Commission authority to permit an increase in the maximum lawful price for any category of natural gas and to set new maximum lawful prices in the case of certain natural gas subject to Section 107 of the NGPA, as amended by this Act. The Commission can permit an increase or set a new maximum price only if it determines that such increase or price is just and reasonable within the meaning of the Natural Gas Act and is based upon the costs of production which have occurred for the category of natural gas involved, or upon increases in such costs. The Commission is specifically prohibited from considering the costs of fuels and commodities other than the fuels and commodities actually used in producing the natural gas involved when making its just and reasonable determination.

The Commission is required to prescribe new maximum lawful prices pursuant to the standards set out in Section 5(a) for each category of high-cost natural gas described in Section 107(c)(1)-(4) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. § 3317(c)(1)-(4)): (1) natural gas produced from a depth of more than 15,000 feet; (2) natural gas produced from geopressured brine; (3) occluded natural gas produced from coal seams; and (4) natural gas produced from Devonian shale. These new maximum lawful prices will apply to natural gas produced from wells the surface drilling of which commence after the date of enactment of the Act.

Under Section 5(a), the Commission is also required to prescribe a rule setting forth its standards for making just and reasonable determinations not later than six months after the effective date of the Act. Section 5(a) prescribes additional procedures for setting these standards and requires the Commission to set out specifically those costs of production which will enter into its just and reasonable determinations. The rule setting just and reasonable standards shall not take effect until after 30 calendar days of continuous session of Congress have elapsed. This will allow Congress an opportunity to review the rule.

Section 5(a) also expressly prohibits the application of the special adjustments set forth in Section 502(c) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3412(c)) to any just and reasonable determination.

Section 5(b) strikes out Section 106(c) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3316(c)). The Commission's authority under Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) to permit increases in the maximum lawful prices of interstate and intrastate rollover contracts which are just and reasonable makes Section 106(c) unnecessary.

HIGH-COST NATURAL GAS

Section 6(a) makes clear that the repeal of Section 121(b) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3331(b)) is not intended to reimpose controls on prices of high-cost natural gas under Section 107(c)(1)–(4) of the NGPA, which is produced from a well the surface drilling of which commenced on or before the date of enactment of the Act.

Section 6(b) amends Section 107(a) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3317(a)) to prescribe maximum lawful prices for high-cost natural gas described in Section 107(c)(1)–(4) of the NGPA which is produced from a well the surface drilling of which commenced after the date of enactment of the Act. The maximum prices for such natural gas are to be determined by the Commission pursuant to the just and reasonable standard set out in Section 5(a) of the bill (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA). Once such price is set for any category of high-cost natural gas, it may be increased only if the Commission determines pursuant to Section 5(a) of the bill that such increase is just and reasonable.

Section 6(c) amends Section 107(c)(5) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3317(c)) to revoke the Commission's authority to create new categories of high-cost natural gas.

PRODUCTION-RELATED COSTS PERMITTED ON CASE-BY-CASE BASIS

Section 7 of the bill amends Section 110(a)(2) of the NGPA (15 U.S.C. §3320(a)(2)) to require a seller for natural gas to petition the Commission if it seeks an adjustment in the maximum lawful price. The Commission is to apply the just and reasonable standard set forth in Section 5(a) (new Section 101(a) of the NGPA) to any such petition.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 8(a) of the bill sets an effective date as of the first day of the first calendar month beginning more than 30 days after the date of enactment of the Act. Section 8(b) applies the bill to any first sale, as defined in the NGPA, of natural gas delivered on or after the effective date regardless of the date of sale or the date of the contract.

EXCLUSION OF LESBIAN AND GAY FOREIGN NATIONALS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, today in this country which speaks to the world as the cradle of liberty, there is a provision of the law which denies the basic principle of freedom of travel and which discriminate against a group of human beings in an ugly act of official prejudice.

This law denies the right of entry to this country to lesbians and gay men—simply because of who they are.

It was originally a product of the hysteria of the McCarthy era. It has since been reaffirmed in the name of science, in the name of the public good, and in the name of morality. But its real origins lie in fear and ignorance and in that ancient scourge of humankind—prejudice.

From ancient times until the present, lesbians and gay men have made history, have contributed through politics and art and science to human progress.

This absurd and vicious law tells us that a Michelangelo could not have come to this country to teach art or, more recently, a W. H. Auden would have been excluded form speaking to Americans about poetry.

This is not a theoretical problem. This week in Washington, the International Gay Association is meeting. Today, we have heard some of them tell us of their experiences with this policy. They suffered humiliation, discrimination, and intolerable invasion of their personal rights. They were not statistics or faceless names of unknown people—they were sincere and intelligent and dedicated people—people I was proud to meet and to learn from.

As an American, I am dismayed that the members of this organization, wishing to meet freely in a free country, needed to discuss in their native countries how to protect themselves from immigration authorities here. Our policy requires that lesbians and gay men hide, that they deceive American authorities. Indeed, its insidiousness is illustrated by the fact that it requires invisibility—the very factor that lesbians and gay men have been struggling to overcome, a fundamental issue in their movement.

I am outraged, as are all decent Americans, that the good people who have come here for this meeting, should have done so at the risk of arrest and deportation and that they felt fear at our border.

Many of us in this country and in this Congress believe that the policy of excluding lesbians and gay men is an affront to decency and an obvious denial of basic human rights and of the principles on which this country was founded.

We in Congress must repeal this law, must wipe it off the books, and with this action we must end forever the time when this country closes its borders to lesbians and gay men.

The testimony of Greg Day and Dr. David Kessler, both of whom testified at the July 14 congressional briefing on INS policy, are included below:

TESTIMONY OF GREG DAY, PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE LESBIAN GAY FREEDOM DAY COMMITTEE, SAN FRANCISCO AND REPRESENTATIVE FOR GAY ACTIVISTS CARL HILL

Representative Dixon, other Members of Congress, Delegates from the International Gay Association, and guests: My name is Greg Day. I am President of the Board of Directors of the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Committee in San Francisco and coordinator of and plaintiff in the Lesbian-Gay Freedom Day Committee's successful suit against the anti-Gay U.S. Immigration Law. I am a member of the Board of Directors of the San Francisco International Lesbian and Gay Film Festival and Vice President of Stonewall Gay Democratic Club. I am also an official representative for British Gay activist Carl Hill who has recently completed a successful three year legal battle against the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service.

In my statement this morning I will present evidence of the extreme hardship this current policy of exclusion of Lesbian and Gay non-citizens poses for both U.S. citizens and our guests from other countries. I will also give an overview of two important legal challenges to this current INS policy by Carl Hill and the Lesbian Gay Freedom Day Committee.

I would like to begin this presentation with a comment on Professor Charles Gordon's statement against section 121 of the proposed Simpson-Mazzoli Bill, which gives complete authority to INS inspectors to exclude non-citizens without the current right of appeal. As I understand it this is the current system used in the United Kingdom by border officials to selectively exclude people of color and other minority groups. In 1981 this procedure was used on a least two occasions to exclude Gay United States citizens arriving at London airport from San Francisco. Although the United Kingdom does not have a written policy of excluding homosexuals these two individuals were questioned at length about their sexual orientation, and relationship to their spouse with whom they were traveling and then excluded. The current right to an appeal before the INS court is essential to protect against anti-Gay discrimination by INS inspectors at the border.

Each year thousands of Gay and Lesbian visitors enter the United States from every country in the world. They come as tourists, as the relatives and friends of U.S. citizens, as business people, scholars, artists, and other specialists. In short, they enter the United States for every purpose the heterosexual visitors enter.

The United States is the only country in the world which has a policy of exclusion and deportation of Lesbian and Gay foreigners. This is the only country in the world which routinely and arbitrarily questions entering visitors about the most private details of their romantic and sexual lives.

This policy violates the privacy and human rights of non-citizens and the right of U.S. citizens to invite people from other countries to visit the United States regardless of their sexual orientation. It violates our Constitutional right to association and political discourse with Gay and Lesbian citizens of other countries.

Since its implementation in the 1950's, the INS has used this policy to exclude hundreds and possibly thousands of Lesbian and Gay visitors. The INS has used this policy selectively to exclude those individuals who have the least economic and political resources to fight the law. The primary victims have been poor people, people who do not speak or understand English, people of color, women and the small percentage of Lesbians and Gay men who do not conform in their dress or mannerisms to the traditional sterotypes of gender. Noticeably missing from the list of those excluded are publicly known Gay government officials, scientists, artists and wealthy individuals from other countries.

The INS has throughout the history of this law enforced exclusionary procedures in a manner that has obscured the full record. In implementing this policy the INS has followed a procedure of informing suspected homosexuals at the border that they have only two choices: (1) to request a hearing by the INS where they will be found to be homosexual and excluded forever from the United States, and (2) to withdraw their request for entry and return to their home country and thereby retain the right to reenter the United States again at a future time. Those who withdraw their application to enter the United States are not recorded by the INS as having been excluded or as being a suspected homosexual. Faced with seemingly unbeatable odds few individuals have chosen to stay and fight for their rights.

This policy has been used selectively at points of entry to reinforce regional patterns of racial discrimination. In California a disproportionate number of people arriving from Mexico have been singled out as homosexual and excluded from entry.

In August of 1979 two Mexican tourists were excluded for being Gay at San Francisco Airport. Again in 1979 Jaimie Chavez, a clothing designer from Mexico City was stopped at San Francisco Airport, strip searched, and held incommunicado for several days before being allowed to contact an attorney. Chavez was accused by INS officials of being Gay because they found dresses in his luggage that he was delivering to a wealthy woman client in San Francisco. In June of 1981, during Gay Pride Week, a U.S. citizen of Hispanic descent returning from a vacation in Mexico was held by INS officials at San Francisco Airport and threatened with exclusion because of Gay printed material found in his luggage. While being detained he was informed by Mexicana Airlines personnel that the INS had excluded many Gay people arriving from Mexico during Gay Pride Week.

In 1979 over two hundred Canadian women were stopped and excluded at the U.S. border for being homosexual. INS officials stated that the fact that "they were traveling in the company of other women . . ." was proof of their homosexuality. These women were entering the United States to attend the Michigan Women's Music Festival, which had been advertised locally as a feminist and pro ERA event.

On May 5, 1981, Phillip Fotheringham, a dual citizen of both Canada and United Kingdom, was stopped at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, identified as Gay by INS officials and forced to return to London. Singled out initially for financial reasons, Mr. Fotheringham was subjected to humiliation and invasion of privacy when eight INS officials read in his presence excerpts from his personal diary and letters from his lover which indicated his sexual orientation. This was in direct violation of the current INS policy of excluding only those non-citizens who made an unsolicited statement that they were homosexual.

On June 13, 1979, Carl Hill, a British Gay activist and journalist, was stopped at San Francisco airport for wearing a button which stated "Stonewall 69, Gay Pride 79" in commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the Stonewall Rebellion and London's Gay Pride Celebration. Hill was traveling with his spouse of fifteen years Michael Mason. It was their first visit to the United States and they had come to document the annual Gay Freedom Day Parade for Gay News a national British newspaper.

Carl Hill was questioned at length about his sex life, and his relationship to Michael Mason. He admitted to being Gay and chose to be paroled into the country to await a hearing and to be given a medical examination by the U.S. Medical Service as required by Congress to prove that he was "afflicted with psycopathic personality and or sexual deviancy." Hill sought the legal aide of Gay Rights Advocates and began a three year legal battle against the INS.

On June 19, 1979, Judge Stanley Weigel issued a temporary restraining order against U.S. Surgeon General Julius Richmond prohibiting the administration of psychological testing of Hill. On June 24th Carl Hill and Michael Mason marched at the front of the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Parade in San Francisco. In August of 1979, Surgeon General Richmond issued a directive to the Public Health Service to no longer conduct medical examinations of homosexual aliens.

In September of 1980 the Justice Department issued new operating instructions to INS inspectors to exclude only those Lesbians and Gay men who made an "unsolicited, and unambiguous admission of homosexuality," or who are "identified by a third party as homosexual." In November of 1980 Carl Hill returned again to San Francisco to challenge the new INS exclusionary procedures. Hill declared to INS inspectors at the airport that he was Gay and was paroled into the country and ordered to appear before a federal immigration judge. Judge Bernard J. Hornbach declared the INS statue "long outdated" and unenforceable and the Public Health Service medical examiners may no longer test for this non-disease. INS attorneys appealed and in July of 1981 the Board of Immigration Appeals declared the current exclusionary procedure valid.

In June of 1981, Mary Dunlap, attorney for the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Committee filed suit in Federal District Court for an injunction against enforcement of the INS exclusion of Lesbian and Gay foreigners. The Committee, which produces San Francisco's annual Gay Pride Parade and Celebration, had invited Gay British Rock Star Tom Robinson and Mexican Gay activist Ignacio Alveras to participate. Also expected to attend were several thousand Lesbian and Gay visitors from Europe, Latin America and Asia.

On June 23, 1981, Tom Robinson arrived at San Francisco Airport wearing a "Let Gays IN" T-shirt. Robinson asked INS officials if they had a policy of excluding Gay foreigners and they replied "no." On June 24th, Federal District Judge Robert P. Aguilar issued a preliminary injunction prohibiting enforcement of the INS law excluding homosexuals in the Northern District of California. Aguilar stated that the first amendment rights of U.S. citizens to intellectual companionship and colleagiality with Gays and Lesbians from outside the United States may outweigh government interests.

In April of 1982 attorneys Jeff Appleman and William Dillingham petitioned Judge Aguilar to hear Carl Hill's case as "related" to the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Committee case currently before him. Aguilar agreed and Carl Hill returned to San Francisco for the third round in this legal battle. On June 17, 1982, Judge Aguilar issued a written ruling on both the Hill and Committee cases. Aguilar stated that the current INS procedure for the exclusion of homosexual non-citizens does not follow the intent of Congress. He stated that Carl Hill cannot be excluded from the United States without a medical examination to determine sexual deviancy and or psycopathic personality opinion does not consider homosexuality to be a medical disorder, psychopathic personality, or sexual deviation.

Following Judge Aguilar's decision INS attorney Michael Tonsing issued a formal letter to Carl Hill welcoming him to the United States as a "visitor for pleasure. . ." and stating that the INS would not issue new exclusionary proceedings against him.

In the Lesbian/Gay Freedom Day Committee Case Aguilar declared that: ". . . The INS policy of per se exclusion of homosexual aliens from entry into the United States . . . is invalid as contrary to Congressional intent, and as unconstitutionally abridging plaintiffs' First Amendment rights." . . . "Plaintiffs seek to engage in discussion and exchange with homosexual aliens. They seek to share information and ideas relating to the laws and attitudes regarding homosexuality in other countries in order to better deal with the laws and attitudes toward homosexuals in the United States. Through this sharing process plaintiffs also seek to improve the political position of homosexual groups in the United States and to gain greater public acceptance for homosexual persons in the United States. There are well recognized and compelling First Amendment interests."

On July 16, 1982 Judge Aguilar ruled that the preliminary injunction against this INS policy be made permanent and in effect throughout the United States. If the INS does not receive a stay, this injunction will go into effect July 26, 1982 and remain in effect until such time that any appeals by the INS are decided in Federal court.

Testimony of the American Psychiatric Association

Mr. Chairman and Distinguished Members of the Committee: I am David R. Kessler, M.D., and am currently Associate Clinical Professor of Psychiatry at the University of California School of Medicine in San Francisco, and am staff psychiatrist at the Langley Porter Psychiatric Institute there. I am also the immediate past President of the Caucus of Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Members of the American Psychiatric Association, and past President of the Bay Area Physicians for Human Rights.

The American Psychiatric Association, a medical specialty society representing over 27,000 psychiatrists nationwide, appreciates the opportunity to testify at this special congressional briefing to discuss some of the psychiatric issues related to the existing immigration laws, which currently exclude foreign lesbians and gay men from our country. Indeed, we appreciate the legislative intent of H.R. 3524 to reverse the current exclusionary policy of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service toward lesbians and gay men on the basis that such individuals suffer from a psychiatric disorder, mental defect or disease.

First, because the label of mental illness has been used as part of the rationale to justify the exclusion of gay and lesbian aliens, it is important at the outset to clarify the current position of the American Psychiatric Association regarding homosexuality.

In December, 1973, the American Psychiatric Association, based on careful study of the scientific evidence regarding homosexuality, ruled that homosexuality was no longer to be listed as a mental disorder in its official classification of psychiatric diagnoses. The APA concluded that many homosexuals "show no significant signs of psychopathology," and "are able to function effectively in society."

Furthermore, homosexuality did not meet the criteria necessary for a psychiatric disorder since it did not "either regularly cause emotional distress" nor was it "regularly associated with generalized impairment of social functioning." Indeed, the American Psychiatric Association deplores all public and private discrimination against homosexuals and supports and urges the enactment of civil rights legislation that would ensure homosexuals the same protections now guaranteed to others on the basis of race, creed, color, etc.

This policy remains unchanged as the official position of the APA to this day. Since 1974, homosexuality has been specifically excluded from the APA's official and authoritative compendium of psychiatric conditions: "The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders." Currently, the third edition of this manual (DSM-III) reaffirms that "homosexuality itself is not considered a mental disorder," and homosexuality per se is not included as a psychiatric diagnosis.

The APA has repeatedly and publically been on record as being strongly opposed to all discrimination against gay men and lesbians that is based solely on their homosexuality.

Moreover, the 1981 APA edition of "The Principles of Medical Ethics with Annotations Especially Applicable to Psychiatry" states: "A psychiatrist should not be a party to any type of policy that excludes, segregates, or demeans the dignity of any patient because of ethnic origin, race, sex, creed, age, socio-economic status, or sexual orientation."

Several leaders of American psychiatry have spoken out vigorously in the past on what they considered the potential misuse of psychiatrists for political purposes in helping to exclude aliens by labeling them as homosexuals.

In addition to the erroneous belief that homosexuality constituted some form of mental illness, there have been other important misconceptions regarding homosexuality. Among the most salient is the mistaken idea that human beings can easily be divided into two groups on the basis of whether they are heterosexual or homosexual. This simplistic notion overlooks the complexities of any one individual's sexual orientation or behavior, which may vary over the course of one's lifetime.

Research studies have indicated, for example, that 50 percent of American men have at some time in their lives been involved in homosexual behavior or fantasy. Does that make them all "homosexuals"?

General agreement and clarity on the definition of who is a homosexual is lacking. Even the terminology varies. While some use the term "homosexual" others prefer to use the word "gay" or "lesbian". The word "homosexual" may be used variously to describe a person's same-sex fantasies, actual sexual behavior, or expressed sexual preference. Or it may be used as a label to indicate that an individual belongs to a certain category. Often all of these factors match up in any one individual, but often enough they do not. What label, for example, should we apply to a married woman, in a sexually faithful relationship with her husband, whose sexual fantasies are occasionally or even predominantly homosexual? What about those people who choose to remain celibate, and yet are aware of homosexual arousal? Or those who engage in homosexual behavior, but only for situational and self-serving reasons?

Just as there is no universally agreed-upon definition of who is a "homosexual," there is also no objective diagnostic or screening examination that will detect homosexuals. Psychological testing cannot distinguish between gays and non-gays. Identification is dependent upon the individual's self-report, or on the statements or allegations of others. Psychiatrists, sex researchers, and even gay people themselves can correctly spot only a small proportion of concealed homosexuals. Reliance, for example, on "effeminacy" in men as a criterion would mean that the majority of "masculine" gay males would be overlooked and many non-gay men would be falsely labeled. Cross-dressing is another notoriously inaccurate indicator, since the overwhelming majority of male transvestites are heterosexual, and on the other hand most women in our culture at least occasionally wear slacks.

Concern is sometimes expressed that gay people are child molesters. The truth is that there is nothing about homosexuality per se that is connected with the sexual abuse of children. Indeed, most such abuse takes place inside the family setting, and occurs mainly between fathers and daughters. Overall, heterosexual males account for at least 90% of molestation of minors. Being a sexual abuser of children is much more highly correlated with being a male than with being a homosexual.

Some people feel that gays who are open should not be available as "role models" lest children, or even adults, be themselves induced to become gay. It would be astounding indeed if a small handful of identified gays could so easily overcome the influence of the family and the overwhelming preponderance of the population that is not gay. Surely heterosexuality is not that fragile or unattractive. In fact, the development of a homosexual orientation is not dependent on knowing or identifying with any other gay person. Most gay people report that they became aware of their gayness long before they ever knew of any other gay person's existence.

It should also be recognized that one is not seduced into becoming gay. Homosexual arousal typically is experienced years prior to any physical expression of it. Whatever may lead to a later pattern of predominant homosexuality, one's basic sexual orientation will not be reversed by seduction. There are no proselytizing or recruitment techniques that will convert straights into gays. A homosexual orientation is no more consciously chosen than is a heterosexual one, and the probability of changing a gay into a straight is about as remote as going in the reverse direction.

In the last decade, there has been a dramatic growth in information about homosexuality. Concomitantly a remarkable change in public attitudes toward homosexuality has taken place.

We now recognize that there is no one way of being homosexual. There is at least as much diversity among homosexuals as there is among heterosexuals. Merely knowing that someone is gay or lesbian tells us very little about the quality and characteristics of that person's life.

We have learned that homosexuality if not inevitably associated with any type of psychiatric pathology, and that a person's psychological, social or vocational functioning is not directly related to sexual orientation.

No longer a taboo topic, homosexuality has emerged as a recognized part of human existence. It has received increasing attention from the communications media, and has been a productive area for scientific research. As more gay people have made themselves known, the old negative stereotypes of who and what homosexuals are have become less firmly entrenched. In numerous scientific, religious, business, academic, and professional organizations, openly gay people have been welcomed and encouraged to make their respective contributions. In our own Association, for example, openly gay members participate as part of the official structure, and at the annual meetings, as well as in several of the local constituent District Branches.

Any progress that the Congress can make toward achieving full human and civil rights for gay men and lesbians will be of considerable benefit in helping to attain the improved psychological and social well-being of all people.

In closing I would note that we are most appreciative of the legislative intent of H.R. 3524 to prohibit the exclusion of foreign lesbians and gay men from our country, but note that it is important to understand how easily such intent could be subverted as the bill is presently written. Accordingly, we welcome the opportunity of working with the Congress to provide the necessary medical expertise to eliminate this possibility.

We are grateful for the opportunity to appear here today, and are pleased to respond to any questions that you may have.●

TRIBLE STUDENT ASSISTANCE ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TRIBLE) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. Speaker, many of us in Congress are concerned about the rising cost of higher education and the uncertainty that surrounds Federal support for student assistance. The rapidly growing cost of college tuition and fees place an increasing burden on families who want to provide a college education for their children. According to the House Committee on Education and Labor's Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, tuition rose 13 percent for private schools and 14 percent for public higher education institutions during the 1981-82 school year.

At the same time, large Federal deficits require restraint by the Federal Government. With the budget deficit expected to reach an unacceptably high $109 billion, the Federal Government cannot provide significant increases in student assistance.

This situation calls for a new approach, one which reconciles the substantial benefits to our society from student aid with the stark reality of our fiscal problems.

Today, I am introducing legislation which will encourage voluntary support of Federal student assistance. This bill can provide significant amounts of student aid without an adverse effect on Federal revenues or the Federal budget deficit.

My bill would allow taxpayers to contribute part of their income tax refunds—$10 on an individual tax return, or $20 on a joint return—to support existing Federal programs of financial assistance for postsecondary education.

The plan itself is quite straightforward. A taxpayer who was due a refund would check a box at the end of his income tax form. He would specify how much of his refund—up to $10, or $20 on a joint return—he wished to contribute to student financial assistance.

In addition, because the funds for the assistance will be drawn from income tax refunds, there would be no revenue loss from this proposal. The budget deficit will not be increased. This has been confirmed by the Joint Committee on Taxation.

Amounts designated would be used to fund programs authorized under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965. These loans, grants, and work study programs all aid postsecondary students to meet college costs. These programs include guaranteed student loans, Pell grants, national direct student loans, supplemental education opportunity grants, and student incentive grants. The donor could, if he wished, specify which program he wished to support.

If the taxpayer does not specify a program, contributions would be allocated by the Secretary of Education among the title IV programs. All contributions would then be dispersed as student aid using established program eligibility criteria.

Many of the title IV programs such as Pell grants and "campus-based aid" provide financial support on the basis of need. This bill will encourage voluntary support of needy and deserving students. Moreover, new aid will be available to moderate-income families through guaranteed student loan programs. This will enable these families to manage the high cost of college education.

How much assistance could be available from the Trible bill? Statistics for the taxable year 1980 suggest a potential of raising $1 billion or more each year. In 1980, 68.4 million returns were eligible for refunds. Of this total, 29.4 million were joint return and 39 million were individual. If all those filling a joint return contributed the maximum $20 and every individual contributed $10, the $976.7 million would have been raised. And as the number of taxpayers and refunds increases the amounts raised would also increase. Should the maximum amount be realized, it would increase funds available for student assistance by approximately one-sixth.

Quite clearly, the potential for increasing student aid is substantial. I believe that most taxpayers will be willing to make modest contributions to this worthy cause.

I believe all the friends of higher education in the Congress can support the Trible voluntary student aid bill and I urge them to do so.●

UPDATE ON RECONCILIATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, as you know, nine House committees are currently working to meet the reconciliation instructions contained in the first budget resolution. That resolution called for over $6 billion in outlay reductions and over $20 billion in revenue increases to be achieved through the reconciliation process. The following is an update on action taken by committees so far:

RECONCILIATION UPDATE—REDUCTIONS DIRECTED UNDER RECONCILIATION FISCAL YEAR 1983

House committee	Budget authority	Outlays	Committee action
Agriculture	779	779	On July 20, the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition met, achieving savings of $206,000,000 in the food stamp program. The Subcommittee on Livestock, Dairy, and Poultry and the Subcommittee on Wheat, Soybeans, and Feed Grains are scheduled to meet July 22 to consider changes in the dairy and wheat and feed grain programs. A meeting of the full committee is expected next week.
Armed Services	213	213	Armed Services Committee has been involved in the Defense authorization bill on the floor. They are, however, expected to recommend linkage with action on civil service COLA.

[In millions of dollars]

House committee	Budget authority	Outlays	Committee action
Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs.	.....	695	A full committee markup session has been scheduled for Tuesday, July 27. The basis for markup will be legislation introduced July 21 to reduce salaries and expenses authorizations in the Banking Committee jurisdiction in addition to taking credit for legislation already approved by the House.
Energy and Commerce	513	674	On July 16, 1982, the Health Subcommittee held hearings on reconciliation in the medicaid program. A markup schedule is expected within the next 2 weeks.
Foreign Affairs	.....	2	The committee plans to recommend linkage with action on civil service COLA.
Merchant Marine and Fisheries.	4	4	The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee plans to recommend linkage with action on civil service COLA.
Post Office and Civil Service.	.....	376	The committee on July 21 marked up H.R. 6785 which makes reconciliation savings of $33,000,000 by rounding down civil service annuities and changing retirement eligibility dates for voluntary retirements. In addition, a 4-percent cap on Federal pay is made a "floor" as well as a ceiling. No cap on retirement COLA was recommended. The committee will seek a rule next week. The Budget Committee will recommend that an amendment be permitted the minority to place a 4-percent cap on retirement COLA's pursuant to reconciliation instructions.
Veterans' Affairs	77	77	The committee reported its reconciliation savings on July 22. The reconciliation provisions are included within COLA legislation for veterans with service connected disabilities. The committee intends to bring the bill to the floor on July 27.
Ways and Means (revenues $20,900).	593	3,755	Ways and Means has not yet met to markup a revenues package, although it is expected to do so this week. However, the full committee did vote to increase the Federal unemployment tax July 15, which would raise $1.4 billion in fiscal year 1983. The committee has approved deficit reductions for fiscal year 1983 of $5.3 billion in health and income security programs.

LETTER TO PRESIDENT REAGAN ON LONG-TERM GRAIN AGREEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. McEWEN), is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, the current U.S.-U.S.S.R. long-term grain agreement expires on September 30, 1982. President Reagan has indicated that he will soon decide what course of action he will take in negotiations for a new agreement.

In the interests of rural America this agreement must be extended and higher levels of grain sales to the Soviet Union should be allowed.

The current long-term agreement was signed in 1975 and originally ran from October 1976 until September 1981. Last August it was extended for another year. The agreement requires the Soviets to buy at least 6 million tons of American grain each year and allows them to purchase up to 8 million tons of grain without consultations with American officials. The United States is not allowed to disrupt the shipment of the 8 million tons. Under the agreement the Soviets are required to purchase grain in an orderly manner. Without a new grain agreement we could return to the situation of the early seventies where unrestricted Soviet purchases of American grain caused severe market disruptions in the United States.

Today the American farmer is faced with low prices and a tremendous grain surplus that promises to continue to depress prices for sometime to come. The yearly carryover of grain stocks is projected to rise from approximately 80 million tons average to over 100 million tons this year. To assist our farmers, we have to allow them to aggressively market their products overseas. Soviet grain imports have risen to 45 million tons annually and now total nearly 20 percent of world grain trade. Our ability to sell to the Soviets is a key point in our attempt to return to prosperity in rural America.

In December 1981, President Reagan suspended negotiations on a new long-term grain agreement with the Soviets in response to the imposition of martial law in Poland. That postponement has served its purpose. A new agreement would not reduce the President's flexibility for future sanctions against the Soviets. The law now requires that an embargo would have to cover all Soviet-American trade and the President has stated that a new embargo would be imposed only with the cooperation of our allies and under the most extreme circumstances. Any further delay in implementing a new agreement will have far worse consequences for American farmers than for the Soviet Union.

In recognition of these facts nine members of the House Republican Agriculture Task Force, which I chair, have sent a letter to President Reagan to urge him to resume negotiations on a new long term grain agreement with the Soviet Union and to further request that he raise the limits on the amount of grain that we are allowed to sell to them. As representatives of rural America we eagerly await his decision on further negotiations for a new agreement.

REPUBLICAN RESEARCH COMMITTEE,
U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 7, 1982.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As members of the Task Force on Agriculture of the House Republican Research Committee, we are writing to urge you to resume negotiations with the Soviet Union on a new long-term grain agreement.

We feel that it is vital to the interests of the American economy and the American farmer that a new agreement be concluded promptly. This year while American farmers have a tremendous grain surplus, the Soviet Union is faced with another potentially disastrous crop. A new long-term grain agreement is a vital tool in alleviating our burdensome grain surplus by increasing our sales abroad.

We also believe that any new agreement should relax restrictions on the total amount of grain that can be sold to the Soviet Union. Higher sales limits could stir greater Soviet purchases of American grain. Greater American grain export sales can only help to revitalize the American rural economy.

As representatives of rural America we eagerly await your decision on further negotiations for a long-term grain agreement.

Sincerely,

BOB MCEWEN, M.C.

EDWARD MADIGAN, M.C.

SENATE—Thursday, July 22, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, July 12, 1982)

The Senate met at 9 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of love, whose love is unconditional, impartial, infinite, and eternal, teach us love. Forgive us in this place of power and influence for our inclination to downgrade love as weak and sentimental. Help us to comprehend that love is the most powerful force in history—that it was love which prompted the most significant event in history, our Lord's sacrifice on a cross.

Thy word declares:

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing.—I Corinthians 13: 1-3.

Lord God, we need love which overcomes all obstacles and outlasts all things. Teach us love. We ask this in the name of Him who is incarnate love. Amen.

"LAUNCH UNDER ATTACK" INCREASES THE LIKELIHOOD OF NUCLEAR WAR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the past few days, the world inched a step closer to a nuclear war between the United States and the Soviet Union. The possibility became more likely than ever that such a war would begin with a mistake, a computer error, or a mixup in signals or the interpretation of signals. Here is why: Last week, the Soviet Defense Minister, Dimitri F. Ustinov, issued a statement criticizing U.S. military planning and hinting that the Soviets might adopt "launch under attack."

On the 18th of July, Charles Mohr reported in the New York Times on why a "launch under attack" can increase the likelihood of a nuclear war between the two great superpowers. The article was entitled, "A Scary Debate Over 'Launch Under Attack'" and it was subheaded, "Moscow Last Week Hinted at Adoption and Some in Washington Like the Strategy Too."

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 18, 1982]

A SCARY DEBATE OVER "LAUNCH UNDER ATTACK"

(By Charles Mohr)

WASHINGTON.—Launch Under Attack is a nuclear war strategy that is to many thinkers an anathema ranking not far behind preemptive war. But for a supposedly unthinkable idea, it has been much discussed of late. In recent months, a number of American defense policy reports have referred, though mostly negatively, to such a strategy. Briefly defined, it would mean firing some nuclear missiles after getting "reliable" electronic-warning that enemy missiles are on their way. Last week, Moscow repeated hints that it might embrace the policy.

A principal argument against the strategy was succinctly put by Fred C. Iklé, now the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy, in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee three years ago. "If any witness should come here and tell you that a totally reliable and safe launch on warning posture can be designed and implemented," said he, "that man is a fool." Last week, Mr Iklé said he still regarded launch under attack as "hair trigger and irresponsible." Still, some officials argue that while the strategy is dangerous it "might be valuable" to leave so much ambiguity about American intentions that the Soviet Union could never be sure that it had not, in fact, become at least an optional national policy.

Last week the Soviet Defense Minister, Dimitri F. Ustinov, issued a statement criticizing United States military planning and hinting, without explicity using the words, that the Soviets might adopt launch under attack. Earlier this year an important Soviet policy analyst gave a group of visiting Americans a similar warning. But some United States experts believe that, partly because most intercontinental Soviet missiles are powered by liquid fuels and are not all believed to be fueled at any given time, it might be difficult for the Soviet Union to adopt launch under attack strategy at this time. They also believe that the Soviet Union maintains its nuclear forces at a considerably lower alert status than the United States, partly as insurance against possible military mutiny.

However, Dr. Richard L. Garwin, a physicist, defense consultant to several administrations and perhaps the leading American advocate of launch under attack policy, strongly disputes that view. Dr. Garwin says the modern liquid fuels employed by the Russians are no obstacle to keeping missiles fueled at all times. Other authorities take a middle ground, saying that while permanent launch under attack posture might be difficult for Moscow to maintain it could employ the strategy during any period of international tension.

"Strategic warning," which depends to a considerable extent on satellite sensors, might give evidence that the Soviet Union is preparing missiles and other weapons for possible war. But all the most strategic warning can do is to give evidence that the other side may intend to attack. Few, if any, responsible officials have advocated launch on strategic warning—which is, in any case, only another way of describing preemptive attack.

Launch under attack, or under tactical warning that missiles have been fired, is relatively simple in theory. If fixed, land-based ICBM's are highly vulnerable to destruction by Soviet missiles, as America's 1,000 Minuteman missiles are said to be, some of them could presumably be fired during the approximately 30 minutes of flight time required for Soviet ICBM's to reach the central United States. A complicating factor is that submarine-launched missiles aimed at decisionmakers such as the President might arrive at other targets within 10 minutes. Launch under attack is therefore sometimes advocated as a solution to the possible threat of "nuclear decapitation" of United States leadership.

THE THREAT OF ACCIDENTAL WAR

In fact, however, launch under attack policies and theories are far from simple. A report by an advisory panel on MX missile basing, published recently by Congress's Office of Technology Assessment, said that "necessary upgrading" of satellite and radar warning systems and of command, control, communications and intelligence systems would "require several years" and billions of dollars. However, the panel made clear that it believed that the cost would be significantly less than the "tens of billions" required for other methods of protecting and basing MX missiles.

One worry is that technical failures could strikingly increase the possibility of accidental nuclear war. The Congressional panel said that "no matter how much money and ingenuity were devoted to designing safeguards" there would always remain the possibility of error" which could mean "a nuclear war started by accident." But in a 1980 article in International Security, Dr. Garwin argued that launch under attack "seems to present no more hazard of unauthorized or accidental" nuclear firings than does "the present system in which the entire Minuteman force can be fired in a very short time by a proper order." He contended that the problem of unauthorized firing could be "addresses" by the use of so-called permissive action links in the silo and in the missile warhead. These cryptographic systems, borrowed from modern message-security systems, prevent an enemy from interfering with nuclear command systems and, at the same time, mechanically prevent the arming and release of United States weapons until an encrypted "go-code" is fed into the mechanism.

In one of the most chilling—if unintentionally so—passages published in recent years, Dr. Garwin wrote: "The probability of accidental launch can be calculated as the number of candidate signals per year, times the likelihood that any one will be interpreted as a real go-code. Presumably very few putative go-codes would be received per year (the expected number is less than one per year, caused by lightning, electrical noises or the like). If 1000 per minute were received, the pure-chance firing of the missiles would shorten the average human life by less than 0.1 seconds." The statement is less clinical than it may sound; it is based on Dr. Garwin's mathematical estimate that an accidental firing is likely to occur only once in 100 million years.

Many other authorities believe that the inherent dangers of technical failure or accident are either higher or unknowable. Moreover, there has been much speculation about the problems that might arise if either superpower found it possible to "blind" the other side's warning sensors. In the esoteric language of nuclear strategy, this might give "warning by loss of warning."

One of the most unpahatable aspects of launch under attack is that nearly all experts agree that, as one put it, the President's role would only be to "endorse the claim of the sensors that an attack was under way." Dr. Garwin, for one, believes the system would have to be based on "probability function" in which a truly random process would decide the retaliatory measure depending on a mathematical assessment of the number of incoming missiles and re-entry vehicles detected.

HATRED AND PREJUDICE—THE SLIPPERY SLOPE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recenthy a 1,000-pound bomb exploded in a residential section of Belfast and tore apart nearly 300 homes. Because the police had been tipped off, there had been time to evacuate men, women, and children from the area before the blast could maim and kill. The bomb was the largest ever used in the civil strife in Northern Ireland and is the latest indication of the extremism which is being bred there.

Terrorism is the ultimate act of frustration. It is political in intent and violent in manifestation—and it is deadly wrong, cowardly, and tragically misguided. Innocent civilians are not legitimate targets in any strife. Children should not be maimed and killed by indiscriminate gunfire and bombings. Attacks made against unarmed civilians, the elderly, and mothers and children are acts of supreme cowardice. The weak in society do not threaten the lives of the terrorists, yet they have been the targets of the terrorists.

War is rarely justifiable. The only legitimate acts of war are those made in self-defense. These can be legitimately accomplished only by a nation threatened with destruction. The IRA does not meet this description. Rather, the IRA is an aggressor and a transgressor in Northern Ireland. It is locked in battle in a war of politics. However, a political war must be fought using political means. Strikes, nonviolent protests, marches, and demonstrations are legitimate political means to political ends.

Instead, violence is being used by both sides of this essentially religious conflict. Gross violations of human rights occur almost daily. These offend the right to live—the right to live at peace and without fear that the next bus one boards will be shot apart or blown up. And in this violent atmosphere, extremism has been allowed to spread and grow. It has been spread by all who have given their money and support to either of the warring groups. It has been allowed to grow by the failure of peace-loving nations to pressure both sides into moderation and the pursuit of peacful means to resolve disputes. Extremism has been allowed to spread and grow by the lack of moral indignation that is necessary for the world's populations to say, "That's enough." But most of all, it has been allowed to spread and grow by ignorance and stupidity. The type of ignorance and stupidity that I am referring to is the ignorance of prejudice and the stupidity of hatred. Prejudice and hatred enable terrible acts to be committed under false pretenses. By exploiting others' prejudice and hatred, vile demagogs can gain positions of prominence and sway an ignorant public to blindly support acts of genocidal extremism.

And so, 1,000-pound bombs are allowed to be built in people's homes, and people encourage and support such actions. The hat is passed around to finance the creation of these murderous weapons, and people dig deeply into their pockets to support the "cause." And when these same people hear the news of an explosion, they say a silent prayer of thanks, believing that such violent actions are furthering their cause. But they ignore the fact the victims are the innocent—the children, the elderly, the unarmed. And if they ever do notice who the victims really are, they explain it away with resort to a simple-minded rationalization, saying: "The cause is more important than any one individual." Combined with the ignorance of prejudice and the stupidity of hatred, this apathetic attitude toward the sanctity of human life is precisely the kind of attitude which enables genocide to be perpetrated.

The presence of socio-economic and religious conflicts is hardly unique to Northern Ireland. Such conflicts are common worldwide. What is less common, though unfortunately not unique, is the high degree of hatred and prejudice accompanying this conflict. One of the purposes of the Genocide Convention is to demonstrate international resolve to battle the ignorance of prejudice and the stupidity of hatred. Such prejudice and hatred makes a people susceptible to demagogs who are willing to use ethnic, racial, and religious groups as scapegoats in order to promote their personal power. The downward spiral to wholesale genocide is a slippery slope when domestic conflicts are accompanied by mass hatred and prejudice.

I urge the Senate to reaffirm American goals to fight hatred and prejudice by ratifying the Genocide Convention.

ABUSIVE AND REPETITIVE USE OF HABEAS CORPUS PETITIONS

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I wish to once again take a few minutes of the Senate's time to remind my colleagues of the need to address legislation that will reform habeas corpus procedures. Such legislation is an essential part of any attempt to improve the effectiveness of our criminal justice system.

The abusive and repetitive use of habeas corpus petitions by State court convicts to attack their convictions is a problem which is clearly out of hand. It is evident that State prisoners have come to view the habeas petition as a bonus opportunity to confound our criminal justice system. The petition has become for the convict that one extra effort which, regardless of his guilt, may get him off the hook. At the very least, he can continually delay his sentence through the petitioning process. The effect of this frivolous petitioning is the abuse of a valuable safeguard for protecting a citizen's right to a full and fair trial. The writ of habeas corpus was never intended to provide the means for a guilty person to walk free or to delay his just sentence.

The problem would not be so bad if such petitioning was occasional. In recent years, however, there has been an explosion in the number of unwarranted petitions. This explosion has played a significant part in creating the massive backup which presently exists in our Federal and State courts.

Mr. President, we were warned about the present dilemma in 1953, when the Supreme Court decided the Brown against Allen case. This was the case in which the Supreme Court interpreted the habeas corpus statute in such a way so as to give the Federal district courts broad authority to redetermine the merits of State court convictions. At that time, Justice Jackson, in a dissenting opinion, expressed deep concern over the "Floods of stale, frivolous and repetitious petitions which will swamp the dockets of the lower courts and swell our own." Justice Jackson's observations have proven all too accurate. As I have already mentioned, prisoners have not hesitated to take advantage of the easy availability of access to the Federal courts. The statistics clearly demonstrate the dramatic increase: In 1953, the flood consisted of 541 petitions. Last year, there were 7,031 such petitions filed by State convicts in Federal courts. That constitutes a thirteenfold increase in the number of petitions filed since the Brown against Allen decision.

While the vast number of habeas corpus petitions may be frivolous, they still must be reviewed by the Federal courts. This is a time-consuming process. The States are often caught up in the review process simply to provide the necessary information for a decision on a case. As for those cases in which relief is granted, many times the questions raised by the Federal courts go far beyond what is necessary for insuring that a person received a full and fair trial. In effect, the Federal courts often end up relitigating the entire case. The States must be prepared for these instances; they are forced to go to considerable lengths to defend their State court procedures, as well as the particular conviction called into question. The point here is that a tremendous amount of time and resource is spent on the habeas corpus review process, a process which deals with persons who have already been convicted of crimes. I think it is fair to say that much of this time could be spent on prosecuting those felons which have yet to be tried.

I feel that we jeopardize the efficient functioning of our entire system of justice when we allow convicted felons to abuse legal procedures and tie up our courts. In particular, we dilute the notion of finality, a notion which is essential to justice. Moreover, by maintaining review procedures which allow the Federal courts to so easily call into question State court decisions, I believe we undermine the integrity of our State courts.

Senator NUNN and I have spent the last 2 months urging the Senate to take up habeas corpus reform legislation. We have attempted to demonstrate to the Senate the extent of the problem by recounting some of the troublesome petitioning that is done. The cases which we have discussed have been poignant cases, but they have not been exceptions; they have been clear examples of where the writ of habeas corpus has been, and can be, abused.

Senator NUNN and I have also introduced legislation which we feel will remedy many of the problems we have encountered with habeas corpus petitions. This proposal, which is contained in S. 2543, would work to tighten up habeas corpus procedures in a number of ways. Keeping in mind some of the cases that we have discussed in recent weeks, I want to spend the rest of my time today outlining the reforms included in our legislation.

First, it would require that Federal judges, not magistrates, conduct evidentiary hearings. We should not have magistrates making recommended findings of fact which can, in effect, overrule decisions rendered by State trial judges and approved by State supreme courts. If findings are to be made which will serve to overrule State decisions, these findings should be made by a Federal judge.

Second, this legislation seeks to set out in statutory form a definition of the "cause and prejudice" standard laid down by the Supreme Court in the Wainwright against Sykes case. What both the Wainwright decision and this proposal stand for is the notion that deference ought to be paid to orderly State court procedures. Wainwright specified that a person who has not properly raised claims in a State court cannot then turn around and raise those claims for the first time in a habeas proceeding—unless he can show a valid "cause" for his failure to follow State procedures.

Third, this legislation would create a statute of limitations, to assure that habeas claims are filed and considered while the evidence is still fresh. We have witnessed too many cases in recent years in which claims are filed years and years after the State proceedings have become final. Oftentimes, crucial evidence is no longer available, or key witnesses are unable to recollect important facts. The result is that the State is prejudiced in its ability to respond because of the delay. Many of the cases that Senator NUNN and I have recounted in past speeches have demonstrated this problem. We need to have a time limit on such appeals, and our proposal would make that time limit 3 years from the date that a prisoner's State court conviction becomes final.

Finally, our bill would tighten up conditions which trigger new hearings in cases, to assure that needless factual redeterminations are eliminated. Specifically, it would require that a factual hearing could only be held if a petitioner is able to establish one of the eight defects which are recognized as faulty court procedures. If a petitioner could not meet this requirement, a motion for another hearing would be denied.

Taken together, these changes will work to clamp down on the flood of frivolous habeas corpus petitions. The sooner we can do this, the better chance that those with truly legitimate petitions will have of gaining relief. More importantly, the sooner we can do this, the sooner we can redirect judicial resources toward addressing the severe backup in cases which have yet to go to court. I urge the Senate to heed this call and take up this legislation without any further delay.

Mr. President, I yield now to the Senator from Georgia.

THE CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1982, TITLE IV—HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, every day, Congress deals with and debates issues that are of great concern to our Nation. And every day, we try to find a rational solution to those ever increasing and complex issues: Amidst all those problems, crime is one which repeatedly affects the American people in their daily lives. With that in mind, Senator CHILES and I have persisted in speaking daily on the Senate floor to urge our colleagues to focus on the crime issues, including the need for habeas corpus reform.

Interestingly enough, a growing number of representatives of the criminal justice system have been supportive of proposals for habeas corpus reform. It is hardly surprising that so many agree with our belief that one effective way to help eliminate frivolous and repetitive petitions would be the enactment of a statute of limitations for habeas corpus proceedings. Case after case has illustrated that the statutory writ is excessively used by criminals seeking release on the ground that their rights have been violated where the record clearly shows that such is not the case.

In September 1974, Donald Gilbert Smith was indicted for narcotics conspiracy as well as five counts of possession of controlled substances. In December 1974, Smith pled guilty and was sentenced to 4 years imprisonment and 3 years special parole. Despite his guilty plea, Smith successfully appealed the sentence on an alleged error in the sentencing procedure. A superceding six count indictment was immedately returned charging Smith with the same offenses named in the original indictment. Following a jury trial in which he was convicted of all six counts, Smith was sentenced again, this time to 15 years imprisonment and 12 years special parole. Smith's direct appeal of his second conviction was denied in 1978 and a mandate was issued for his arrest on April 30, 1979.

Unfortunately, by the time the appeal has been affirmed some 4 years after his original conviction, Smith was nowhere to be found. He remained a fugitive until February 17, 1981, when he was finally arrested in an Akron, Ohio, motel room. When arrested, Smith was in possession of a small amount of hashish, a 16-inch knife, Ohio and North Carolina driver's licenses issued under fictitious names, and nearly $3,500 in cash. At the time of his original conviction, Smith had been identified by the Drug Enforcement Administration as the largest distributor of hallucinogenic drugs in Akron.

The most incredible part of this story illustrates again the outrageous abuse of the writ of habeas corpus. During his 2 years as a fugitive, Smith nevertheless succeeded in taxing the courts with a steady stream of frivolous litigation. His attorneys filed numerous petitions for habeas corpus relief despite the fact that it had been over 5 years since the original conviction and that he was at the time a fugitive from justice. The most recent of these petitions was finally denied by the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in early 1982.

From 1974 to 1981, the criminal justice system was needlessly overburdened by the repetitive habeas corpus petitions pertaining to Smith. Even while he was a fugitive, his attorneys persisted in filing these petitions. For years, our courts have been struggling to effectively administer criminal justice in the midst of the continual flood of needless and burdensome petitions for habeas corpus. S. 2543, the Crime Control Act of 1982, provides a statute of limitations for habeas corpus relief which would provide immediate relief to our courts while continuing to preserve reasonable access to the habeas corpus remedy. The American criminal justice system has been far too lenient on criminals to the detriment of our honest citizens. The time has come for Congress to get tough on crime. S. 2543 and its proposals for habeas corpus reform are an effective means to do so.

MOTOR VEHICLE THEFT LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator PERCY as a cosponsor of S. 1676, the Motor Vehicle Theft Law Enforcement Act. Motor vehicle theft has become a national problem that requires a national solution.

The car thief of a decade ago stole either for his own transportation needs, or to resell to another person, who would use the car. Because they were kept intact, the vast majority of stolen cars were eventually recovered.

During the past 10 years, however, a new kind of car thief has emerged. He operates, not as an individual, but as a part of an efficient, well organized car theft ring in one of hundreds of cities across the country. He is not interested in cars, as much, but in their valuable parts and components.

The car thieves of today are stealing cars at a rate of 1.1 million per year—$4 billion worth of automobiles that will be paid for by all of us, through higher insurance premiums and a swollen rate of inflation. Stolen cars are driven to "chop shops," where experts quickly remove prized parts—fenders, doors, hoods, trunk lids, and others—before disposing of the remains. Engines and transmissions are usually not kept, as they are marked with identification numbers that allow them to be traced.

The fact is, if a professional thief wants a car, there is almost nothing you can do to prevent his taking it. The car you park in front of your Washington home in the evening may be gone by midnight and dismantled by dawn. Even as you telephone the police the next morning, one of your fenders may be in a truck headed toward Pittsburgh, and the other on its way to El Paso.

But the problem of auto theft goes beyond personal loss and high insurance rates. The car stealing business has proven so lucrative that it is now the target of organized crime, which is seizing control of auto theft rings and funneling their profits into drug and other criminal operations.

S. 1676 counters the problem of auto theft in four ways.

First, it stiffens the Federal criminal penalties for persons that traffic in stolen motor vehicles or their parts.

Second, it establishes procedures to reduce opportunities for exporting stolen automobiles and planes. This is an important provision for my own State, where stolen cars and planes are easily exported to Mexico, making their recovery almost impossible.

Third, the bill sets up two task forces; one to study the problem of off-highway mobile equipment theft, and the other to look into antitheft measures for State motor vehicle titling programs.

But the heart of the bill, and the part I believe will yield the greatest results, is the provision that requires the placing of identification numbers on valuable automobile parts. Today's car thief wants nothing to do with car parts that have identification numbers, so he throws away otherwise precious engines and transmissions. S. 1676 requires that other parts—up to 14 in all—be marked as well, thus reducing their attractiveness to thieves.

The administration opposes S. 1676 because of the expense of the identification program. I appreciate this concern for our troubled auto industry, but must point out that S. 1676 specifically limits the cost of compliance to $10 per vehicle, and actual costs will probably be much lower. I think that most Americans are more than willing to pay an extra few dollars if they know that such an investment will reduce the possibility of losing their new car to a chop shop.

Mr. President, S. 1676 is a new solution to a new problem—a nationwide coalition of auto theft rings that steal our cars and leave us with the bill. I urge the Senate to pass S. 1676 and put a dent in the auto theft industry.

HELP FOR HOME BUYERS

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, This past week, California Savings and Loan lowered its prime home loan rate 1 percentage point to 15 percent. This action is indicative of future mortgage rates and the state of the housing industry. It appears to be in direct response to the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision (Fidelity Savings & Loan against De La Cuesta) permitting federally chartered thrift institutions to enforce due-on-sale clauses in their mortgage loans.

The savings loan industry has experienced a severe depression in recent years. Assumable mortgages have created adversity for the thrift institutions. Many loans that they hold are at much lower rates than the current double digit figures, causing the lenders to charge higher interest rates to other borrowers for homes. This lack of available and affordable credit has caused housing prices to skyrocket and mortgage rates to become unnecessarily high.

Although it seems that assumable low-interest mortgages would be an advantage for home buyers, it is actually a delusion. The seller typically has to ask a higher sales price for the home, thus demanding a higher down payment.

The High Court ruling gives Federal lenders the ability to keep buyers from assuming low-interest home loans. States can no longer prevent savings and loan associations from enforcing due-on-sale clauses in sales contracts to increase interest rate on a loan when mortgaged property is sold.

This decision is a major triumph for the Nation's finance industry and home buyers. The effect will be to lower mortgage rates over time and provide first-time home buyers and purchasers of newly constructed housing fairer access to mortgage financing.

BILINGUAL JUSTICE

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, Tuesday, while reading the editorial page of the the Washington Post, I ran across an editorial which pleasantly surprised me. I am referring to the editorial on "Bilingual Justice."

This insightful piece on bilingual education reflects on a court decision that affects only one State of the Union, but its significance should be heralded across the Nation. The decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned a ruling by a Texas district judge requiring that every public school in the State of Texas provide Spanish-speaking pupils with instruction in Spanish in every grade. As the editorial states, it was the commonsense point of the appeals court that "the issue essentially (is) a pedagogic one: How best to teach comprehension of a language."

I have spoken time and time again before this distinguished body and communicated my beliefs on this important educational issue. This past April I introduced S. 2412, the Bilingual Education Improvement Act, which will make federally funded bilingual education programs more responsive to the needs of local school districts. As I have said in the past, I agree wholeheartedly that we need to do all we can to teach English to non-English-speaking students. However, I cannot support a rigid mandate prescribing a single method of instruction. I believe that, given the flexibility to choose their own program, local schools will emphasize English instruction.

English: It is the single common language used to bond and unite all Americans. It is the responsibility of this Nation's leaders to see that the multitudes of prospective new Americans flowing into this great Nation have "the opportunity to master the language in which business and public affairs in this country are conducted."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following Washington Post editorial entitled "Bilingual Justice" be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 20, 1982]

BILINGUAL JUSTICE

In the ordinary course of things, there isn't much reason to pay attention to a court decision that affects the schools of just one state, but a recent decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals involving the state of Texas is an exception. The issue involved is an important one: how to educate children whose native language is Spanish. It is particularly important in Texas, where 22 percent of the nation's 3 million Spanish-speaking schoolage children live. And its importance has been increased by the Supreme Court decision last month, which overturned a Texas law and required that state henceforth to educate children of illegal aliens, the large majority of whom in Texas are Spanish-speaking.

Finally, the decision is important because it is so sensible. The appeals court here was faced with an order issued by a single district judge requiring that every public school in the state of Texas provide Spanish-speaking pupils with instruction in Spanish in every grade. The order was entered even though the Texas legislature—admittedly, acting under pressure because of the court's ruling—passed a law requiring special instruction for Spanish-speaking pupils, but giving schools a choice between a number of programs. The appeals court overturned the trial court's ruling, making the common-sense point that "the issue is essentially a pedagogic one; how best to teach comprehension of a language. Neither we nor the trial court possess special competence in such matters."

This is not to say that nobody does. On the contrary, school districts all over the country, faced with increasing numbers of non-English-speaking students, have experimented with a variety of approaches and have found many that work. They have also found that different students, coming from a variety of backgrounds and entering school at different ages, need different approaches. The Reagan administration this spring wisely abandoned the attempt to tell local school districts they have to provide instruction in the child's first language. Now the courts in the important state of Texas have done the same thing. "There is no legal or research basis," one expert writes in the Harvard Educational Review, "for the federal government to advocate or require a specific educational approach."

These rulings do not mean that our schools do not have an affirmative obligation to provide special help to pupils speaking a foreign language. They do. But they should not be forced to rely on a single, rigid approach by either the Department of Education or the courts. And they should not lose sight of the goal—a goal whose worth and feasibility has been demonstrated again and again by the past century of our history. That goal is to teach children to speak and write English. We should give educators the leeway to abandon bilingual education programs that mistakenly keep children learning primarily in their native language and deny them the opportunity to master the language in which business and public affairs in this country are conducted.

CHINA-TAIWAN POLICY

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to discuss my views on U.S. relations with China and Taiwan. Recent investigations by my staff show a substantial shift in United States-China-Taiwan policy over the past 10 years. When I questioned the State Department about these matters it indicated that U.S. policy remained unchanged since 1972. Frankly, I find the responses to my questions unsatisfactory and quite disturbing. I am convinced that there have been significant changes in our China-Taiwan policy, and I find the State Department's denials particularly unsettling. It is almost as if the executive branch was consciously attempting to deceive or mislead the Congress and the American people. Even those who may agree with the direction of U.S. policy should be prepared to investigate completely and openly the implications of their policy decisions.

Over a number of years, throughout the China-Taiwan debate, the State Department has maintained that Sino-United States relations depend on a policy of deliberate ambiguity on the sensitive question of sovereignty over Taiwan. This is necessary because the PRC insists Taiwan belongs to China and any U.S. relations with Taiwan—official or unofficial—are an interference in Peking's internal affairs. The PRC is unwilling to compromise on this point. Therefore we chose to resolve the dispute with ambiguous diplomatic language or in Webster's terms, a solution having two or more meanings (Webster's New World Dictionary—first choice, p. 19).

In 1972 this meant that the United States declared that it acknowledged that the Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintained there was but one China and that Taiwan is a part of China.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that several U.S. statements regarding the Taiwan sovereignty issue be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. We went on to say that we did not challenge that position. Although deliberately ambiguous, most observers interpreted this to mean that the United States neither accepted nor rejected the PRC's and ROC's one-China assertion. We remained neutral; recognizing that a dispute existed we decided not to take sides. Nevertheless, such a position represented a major concession on our part, since up to that time we had recognized the ROC claim as being the more legitimate of the two. We maintained diplomatic relations with Taipei and supported its claim to China's seat on the United Nation's Security Council.

The ambiguous formulation agreed upon in the 1979 joint communique went considerably further in recognizing the PRC's claim to Taiwan. Although the word "acknowledged" remained, the object of our acknowledgment shifted noticeably. We no longer just acknowledged that both Chinas asserted the principle that there was one China, but instead acknowledged the Chinese position that there is but one China. By dropping the key phrase "all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain" one could interpret that we had moved from the position of a neutral bystander noting the existence of a dispute, to a party accepting the Chinese assertion that there is one China. Clearly, this was the PRC's interpretation. In the Chinese language version of the agreement the PRC dropped the characters used in the Shanghai communique meaning "acknowledge" and substituted new characters meaning "recognize." Taken together with other developments—the PRC assuming the China U.N. Security Council seat, U.S. diplomatic recognition of the PRC, and U.S. derecognition of Taiwan—the United States indisputably moved closer to the PRC interpretation to the ambiguous formulations we have relied on to maintain good relations with the People's Republic.

More recently, Peking's threats to downgrade relations with the United States, unless Washington agreed to end all arms sales to Taiwan, prompted President Reagan to write to China's Communist Party Chairman, Hu Yaobang, in May 1982, and assure him that, "Our policy will continue to be based on the principle that there is but one China. We will not permit the unofficial relations between the American people and the Chinese people on Taiwan to weaken our commitment to this principle." I am sure you will note that this formulation is the least ambiguous of those that we have used. We now assert that it is our policy, U.S. policy, that there is but one China, and although not stated, indicate implicitly that Taiwan is a part of that one China. The use of the qualifier "acknowledged" has been dropped altogether. The President also pledges that he will not permit the Taiwan Relations Act—his reference to the unofficial relations established by the TRA—to weaken our commitment to the one-China principle, and for the first time, to my knowledge, implies that the people on Taiwan are Chinese citizens by referring to them as the Chinese people on Taiwan.

I do not believe that anyone can dispute that the U.S. policy toward China and Taiwan has changed dramatically over the last 10 years. Let me reiterate one more time, in 1972 we acknowledged that the Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait maintained that there was but one China. Today it is U.S. policy that there is but one China. Despite this remarkable shift over time, the State Department, at each juncture, has assured us that our policy remained essentially unchanged.

A few days ago, I asked the State Department about these changes and Assistant Secretary Holdridge replied in a letter:

> We have said publicly, and to both sides of the Taiwan Strait, that we acknowledge that there is only one China and that Taiwan is part of China. This is our position, and it has not changed since it was originally enunciated in the Shanghai communique of February 1972 and the joint communique of January 1, 1979.

In my view, his answer simply does not square with the facts, and does not accurately reflect what has happened since the Shanghai communique. True, the State Department's view of what was happening has not changed. From the beginning, the executive branch knew that our actions, fuzzed by deliberate ambiguity, moved us closer and closer to accepting PRC sovereignty over Taiwan, but its spokesmen were unwilling to admit it publicly. Instead we received assurance after assurance that this was not the case. In my judgment, the time has come to drop the ambiguity and face up to the implications of our past policy decisions. Few concessions remain in our portfolio. We are precariously close to having our unofficial relations with Taiwan based more on PRC sufferance than on the Taiwan Relations Act which this Congress wrote in 1979.

Moreover, I do not consider my criticisms as merely an arcane academic debate. I foresee dangers ahead. In my view the State Department's approach of incrementally conceding to the PRC demands on the sovereignty issue has seriously undermined our ability to provide for Taiwan's legitimate self-defense needs. Each concession along the way has made it more difficult for us to effectively argue that arms sales to Taiwan do not interfere in the PRC's internal affairs.

We have certainly come a long way from February 1979 when we began the TRA debate. At that time Senator Javits spoke for many of us when he said:

> Mr. Chairman, I believe in the policy which the United States has adopted, but I believe the policy incomplete and that the second half of the policy must be respect for our solemn responsibility to Taiwan. I do not use the word "obligation" because the President has chosen to give notice of termination of the treaty, as we all know was necessary in order to normalize relations with the People's Republic of China (PRC). I do not believe that the legal challenge to that authority is valid, and we will deal with that question as we go along.
> But the important point is that we must substantively protect our responsibility to Taiwan, and it is in our highest national interest to do so. I am delighted to hear our chairman say, as I agree, that it will be our job to see that that is locked in. Indeed, I hope very much that the chairman and I may contrive what is necessary for this purpose with the cooperation of our membership and their joining in.

And we did; the result was the TRA. And as I told the Chinese leadership last summer, without the specific provisions for continued sales of defensive arms to Taiwan in the act there could have been no normalization of relations.

Let me be clear: I have never advocated massive transfers of weapons to Taiwan, and I do not now. But we do have, in Senator Javits words, a "solemn responsibility" to provide Taiwan with arms adequate for its self-defense needs as long as this may be necessary.

Moreover, I have never considered Taiwan in imminent jeopardy of a direct PRC military assault. Peking does not have that military capability today, and may never achieve sufficient capability to take Taiwan by force. More importantly, I do not believe the PRC intends to resort to military force to reunify Taiwan with the mainland. In my judgment, Peking would much prefer to persuade Taiwan to reunify peacefully.

China's strategy all along has been to apply ever-increasing psychological pressures on the Taipei leadership so that it feels compelled to negotiate a deal to reunify Taiwan with the mainland. Peking recognizes that if given a choice the ROC leadership and even the native Taiwanese, who often differ with the KMT leadership, would both opt for the status quo rather than be incorporated into the PRC. But from Peking's perspective, if the U.S. commitments to Taiwan can be undermined or weakened in some way, China's leverage on the ROC to cut a deal would increase substantially. In this context, our willingnesss to provide arms to Taiwan has always been far more important than the actual quantity and quality of arms sales. Obviously we must be prudent and cautious in our arms transfer decision. Gratuitous sales protect no one. But when we appear to bend to Chinese pressures on each and every sale we make to Taiwan it is inevitable that Taipei begins seriously to doubt whether we will live up to our solemn responsibilities.

State Department spokesmen urge me not to worry and indicate that "our relations with China, as you know, are predicated on our expectation that the Taiwan issue will be resolved peacefully by the Chinese people themselves." In fact, they are so confident that the issue can be resolved peacefully that they state that:

> It is in this context that we have been and will continue to judge Taiwan's defense needs.

Unfortunately, I am not quite so sanguine. Sure, if Taiwan decides that it wants to reunify with the mainland everything will work out fine. But, what if the present leadership decides that reunification is not in the island's interest? What then?

Warren Christopher told the Foreign Relations Committee during the TRA debate that:

> It is our position that if there is to be a reunification, it is of great importance that it be peaceful and not be destabilizing in the area. But we do not have a position of encouraging the people on Taiwan to do something against their will.

That was an excellent policy then and one I fully endorse today.

For me that was what the Taiwan Relations Act was all about. Despite derecognition, we were pledging to the people of Taiwan that the American people would do what they could to insure that the island's peoples had a free choice. If they freely chose to reunify with the mainland we would not object. But if they chose instead not to reunify that also would be acceptable. In the words of the TRA, we would:

> Consider any effort to determine the future of Taiwan by other than peaceful means, including boycotts or embargoes * * * of grave concern to the United States * * * > maintain the capacity of the United States to resist any resort to force or other forms of coercion that would jeopardize the security of the social or economic system, of the people of Taiwan.

If insuring that the people of Taiwan retain a free choice on the question of reunifying with China means supplying needed selected defensive arms to those people over Peking's objections and in the face of threats to downgrade United States-People's Republic of China relations, then so be it.

U.S. STATEMENTS REGARDING THE TAIWAN SOVEREIGNTY ISSUE

SHANGHAI COMMUNIQUE

(February 1972)

"The U.S. side declared: The United States acknowledges that all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain there is but one China and that Taiwan is a part of China. The United States Government does not challenge that position."

JOINT COMMUNIQUE

(December 1978)

"The Government of the United States of America acknowledges the Chinese position that there is but one China and Taiwan is part of China."

SENATE TRA DEBATE

Senator JAVITS. "I notice that the Chinese translation, according to our staff, of the communique, which is the basis for our action here uses a Chinese word which means "recognition" in respect of the PRC's view of Taiwan, the one-China view, whereas our translation—and I have it before me—uses the words, "the Government of the United States of America acknowledges the Chinese position that there is but one China and that Taiwan is part of China," and that is the language of the Shanghai communique—acknowledgement. Now is it going to be made clear to the Chinese that our position remains consistent? They have their interpretation. Whether Chiang Kai-shek made the mistake of his life we won't know, probably, until long after I am gone. But that is their interpretation and not ours. We accept it. It is very important that we not subscribe to it either way."

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. "Senator Javits, we regard the English text as being the binding text. We regard the word "acknowledge" as being the word that is determinative for the U.S. We regard the Chinese word as being subject to that as one of the meanings of it. I simply give you assurance on that point."

REAGAN LETTER TO HU YAOBANG

(May 1982)

"Our policy will continue to be based on the principle that there is but one China. We will not permit the unofficial relation between the American people and the Chinese people on Taiwan to weaken our commitment to this principle."

STATE DEPARTMENT EXPLANATION

(July 1982)

"We have stated publicly, and to both sides of the Taiwan Strait, that we acknowledge that there is only one China and that Taiwan is part of China. This is our position, and it has not changed since it was originally enunciated in the Shanghai Communique of February 1972 and the Joint Communique of January 1, 1979."

A SALUTE TO PIONEER DAY

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, on July 24, 1847, the first of many thousands of Mormon pioneers first arrived in Salt Lake Valley and began the colonization of Utah and many areas of the Far West. The commemoration of those first 147 hardy pioneers is celebrated not only in Utah but in many Western States by the decendents of those pioneers.

The leader of this first pioneer group was Brigham Young, a man of infinite capacity for organization, leadership, and spirituality. He organized an exodus of his followers from the then United States and led them into an uncharted and untamed territory. This movement spanned the years 1847 until the railroads were built in 1863. There is no parallel to this organized movement in American history. Brigham Young was not content merely to establish a haven in a new town named Salt Lake City; he sent teams of his "saints" throughout Utah Territory, Nevada Territory, and beyond to establish a farflung theocratic dominion.

But it was more than Brigham Young's charismatic personality which motivated his followers. Those who endured the long trek across the Plains were a sturdy group willing to make whatever sacrifices were necessary to secure their religious freedom. They sought the chance to raise their children free from persecution and to lead them along the path of a restored religion that involved every aspect of their daily lives. They bent the raw wilderness to their goals and created from it a land of milk and honey.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Leonard J. Arrington be printed following my statement which expands on the history of the colonizing efforts of these pioneers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit No. 1.)

Mr. CANNON. The fruits of the labors of those pioneers and their descendents can be clearly seen on this 135th anniversary. Their faith has sustained the growth and spiritual influence of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the so-called Mormons, from very humble beginnings in Fayette, N.Y., to an international faith of some 5 million members today.

From its humble beginnings, Salt Lake City is now among the great cities of the world and rightfully claims the distinction of being "The Crossroads of the West."

The history of my home State of Nevada has been strongly influenced by the Mormon pioneers, including my own forebears. "Mormon station," the present Genoa, Nev., was the first known settlement in Nevada history.

Present-day Las Vegas was initially an outpost of the colonizing efforts of Brigham Young and has a large Mormon population today. Early in 1855, church members began construction of a fort in one of the few natural oases between the Pacific coast and Salt Lake City. Portions of that structure remain preserved today in Las Vegas.

The descendents of those first pioneers have continued the traditions of their parents. Devotion to family, church, and Nation; commitment to hard work; patronage of the arts and music; and development of each individual's talents are the guiding principles of church members today. Their contributions to the strength of our Nation are simply beyond enumeration. Truly, there is much to celebrate on this anniversary of the day when the first wagons of pioneers descended into Salt Lake Valley.

I, myself, was born into a Mormon family in one of those settlements begun under the direction of Brigham Young. That settlement is the present St. George, nestled in the beautiful red hills of southern Utah, from which I moved to Nevada a number of years ago. My grandfather, David H. Cannon, helped build the beautiful St. George temple, the first Mormon temple completed in Utah, and served for many years until his death as its president. I am proud of that heritage. Mr. President, I salute the church and Mormons everywhere on this celebration of "Pioneer Day."

COLONIZING THE GREAT BASIN

(By Leonard J. Arrington)

When the Later-day Saint pioneers arrived in the Salt Lake Valley in July 1847, they divided themselves into small groups or "brigades." One group went to the mountains to secure timber for building cabins. Another built bridges across the streams. Another plowed and planted crops. Still another brigade went to southern California and to Fort Hall in Idaho to secure seeds, fruit, fruit trees, and cattle.

But the largest brigade commenced a systematic program of exploration, beginning with the Salt Lake Valley and then proceeding to Tooele Valley to the west, Weber and Ogden valleys to the north, Utah Valley to the south, and other nearby areas. The goal was to find suitable areas where the 16,000 Latter-day Saints poised on the banks of the Missouri River could settle. Within a year or two a large exploring company was dispatched to southern Utah and across southern Nevada to southern California. They found iron in southern Utah, and oasis and springs along their route, and laid the basis for many future Latter-day Saint settlements.[1]

1848—WITHIN UTAH

The settlement process took place in five stages. The first colony out of Great Salt Lake City, as they called it at the time, was ten miles south in what is now Cottonwood and Holladay. In 1848 a group of 250 migrants from Mississippi, including 40 black servants, located on farms there. Within two years, the irrigable land in the remainder of the Salt Lake Valley and contiguous valleys was occupied: About 20,000 Latter-day Saints had settled in Tooele and Grantsville, Davis and Box Elder counties, Weber and Ogden valleys, Utah Valley, Sanpete Valley, and Parowan and Harmony in southern Utah.

1850'S—NEVADA, THE "MORMON CORRIDOR," AND PARTS OF IDAHO

The second stage of settlement, occurring in the early 1850s, was the colonization of western Nevada, southern California, and northern Idaho. Early in 1849, a group of fifteen Latter-day Saints joined a company of non-Mormons traveling westward to Humboldt Springs, the Sierra Nevada, and northern California. Upon reaching Carson Valley, near the California border, seven of the Saints decided to remain and establish a supply station. By the mid-1850s the Mormon Station at Carson was an officially supported and strategic colony in the Latter-day Saint network around the Great Basin.

Meanwhile, the Saints were locating a whole string of settlements stretching south from Salt Lake City to San Pedro and San Diego, California, in a geo-political plan called the "Mormon Corridor." The first in the chain was in Utah Valley, where Provo is located; three thousand people lived there in 1852. Ephraim, Manti, and other towns were located farther south in Sanpete Valley. Parowan was established in the Little Salt Lake Valley in 1851.

The line of new settlements stretched on to Las Vegas, now Nevada, where a colony was established in 1855 to work with the Indians in the region, to mine lead, and to raise semitropical agricultural products. Farther on, a colony was established at San Bernardino, California. The reasons for the settlement are given in President Brigham Young's official journal: to continue the chain of settlements from Salt Lake City to the Pacific; to provide a mail station; to cultivate olives, grapes, sugar cane, cotton, and other such desirable fruits and products; and, in President Young's words, "to plant the standard of salvation in every country and kingdom, city and village, on the Pacific and the world over, as fast as God should give the ability."[2] Some 450 church members from the Salt Lake Valley arrived in 1851, and by 1855 there were about 1,500 inhabitants. Their butter, cheese, eggs, and flour were sold throughout southern California, as also was a large supply of lumber which they secured from the San Bernardino Mountains.

The Idaho colony was founded in 1855, when a company of men went to the Lemhi Range of mountains near present-day Salmon. This was then Oregon Territory. The purpose of the settlement was to make friends with the Bannock, Shoshone, and Snake Indians. The men erected a fort, built homes and a blacksmith shop, and planted and fenced several acres of land. The settlement was a success, at least temporarily, and other settlers from Utah arrived. When President Brigham Young visited the settlement in 1857, everything seemed to be going well. But the next year a large party of Bannock and Shoshone, some of whom had previously been friendly, attacked the settlers, drove off most of their stock, and killed some of the men. The colony was abandoned.

The second Mormon experience into present-day Idaho begin three years later as part of the settlement of the irrigable places in Cache Valley. Many persons had thought that Cache Valley was too cold to grow crops on a regular basis, but a long dry spell in 1855–56 caused Church leaders to reconsider. An experimental colony was established at Wellsville in 1856. In 1858 there was an influx of additional settlers, particularly Latter-day Saints originally from the southern states who had returned to Utah from San Bernardino. Their success attracted others, and Franklin, Idaho, was settled under the direction of Preston Thomas, a former Texan, in 1860. This was the first permanent Anglo-Saxon settlement in what is now Idaho. As time went on, the Saints spread up into Preston and other places in Oneida and Franklin counties.

Three years later, when Idaho was made a territory, forty families established a settlement at Paris, in Bear Lake Valley, under the direction of Charles C. Rich, a Latter-day Saint apostle, militia general and frontiersman. This picturesque region had been the site of a fur trapper rendezvous in the 1820's. The success in colonizing Cache Valley had given confidence that Bear Lake could be settled successfully. The Bear Lake colony was strengthened by additional families in the years that followed—sixteen—villages were settled.

In all, some ninety-six colonies or settlements, including the twenty-seven along the Mormon Corridor to California, were founded by the Saints during the first ten years after they came into the Great Salt Lake Valley in 1847. The pattern was one of directed settlements—that is, the colonization was a community effort directed by Church authorities rather than the result of spontaneous and independent movement of individuals: First, there was preliminary exploration by companies appointed, equipped, and supported by the central Church; second, colonizing companies were appointed to found the settlements; and third, the companies were expected to pattern the new community institutions after those of Salt Lake City, which were in turn patterned after those of Nauvoo, Illinois, and Jackson County, Missouri.

Upon reaching their destination the colonists dedicated the land by prayer and cooperatively erected a fort or stockade which would serve as a temporary home and community center, as well as a protection against Indians. From this fort, colonists went forth each day in organized groups to dig canals, plant crops, build roads, fences, and homes, and otherwise prepare the ground work for village life. This day-to-day work was usually planned in meetings of all heads of families—and each colonist was given specific assignments. These meetings were conducted under the direction of an apostle, if one were present, or the bishop who had been appointed in Salt Lake City before the company left.

During this period of preparation the settlement area was surveyed and divided into blocks of ten acres each by an appointed Church engineer. The blocks were separated by wide streets. A large block in the center was reserved for public buildings, and an important early task was the construction of a combination meetinghouse-schoolhouse on this lot. Each of the remaining blocks was divided into equal lots of an acre or more each, which were distributed among the colonists in a community drawing. Each family was entitled to one lot. On these lots the colonists built their homes, planted their orchards, raised their vegetables and flowers, and erected their livestock and poultry sheds.

Outside the village, the surveyor located an area (called "the Big Field") that could be conveniently irrigated. It was divided into lots ranging from five to twenty acres each depending on the amount of irrigable land and the number of colonists. One of these farming lots was assigned to each family, again by a community drawing.

Besides the heavy community involvement, life in the farm villages was a family affair—everyone helped out. Resourcefulness was an important asset. The women often helped build the houses, plow and plant the crops, cut and stack the hay, shear sheep, spin an weave cloth, care for the chickens, and milk the cows. One sister, tells the story of a young man who was leaving in seven days on a proselyting mission. When the women heard that he had no suit to wear, they went to work: "One Sunday the wool was on the sheep's back," she writes, "but by the next Sunday it had been clipped, cleansed, corded, spun, woven, and made into a splendid suit and was on the back of the missionary as he delivered his farewell address in our little church house."[3]

1870'S—SURROUNDING AREAS IN THE WEST

The third wave of Latter-day Saint colonization took place in the 1870s when the Saints swarmed into southern and eastern Idaho, southwestern Wyoming, southern and eastern Nevada, southwestern Colorado, and northern and central Arizona. While this colonization was not called or directed in the same sense as in the 1850s, it was encouraged and supported by the central Church. In most instances the colonies were supervised and assisted by local wards and stakes located near the area being settled.

The Latter-day Saint movement into Idaho was a direct result of a new railroad from Ogden, Utah, north to Montana. The Utah Northern Railroad, financed by eastern interests but with Cache Valley Saints doing most of the labor, was completed from Ogden to Franklin in 1874. It was extended on through the upper Snake River Valley in 1878 and succeeding years. As the railroad pushed north, settlements followed. More than a dozen different villages or communities were settled in the next few years, including Rexburg, Parker, Menan, Lewisville, and Teton. In general this settlement was relatively well organized, under the direction of William B. Preston, the ecclesiastical leader in Cache Valley. Preston's instructions from Church headquarters in Salt Lake City were to settle the Saints in villages, just as was the pattern in Utah. In this way their ecclesiastical organizations could more effectively serve them, they would be closer to schools, and they could more effectively cooperate in making ditches, fencing fields, building bridges, and running their livestock. The village plan also made it easier to guard against horse and cattle thieves, land jumpers, and hostile Indians.

The Church instructions included the following admonition:

"Care must be taken that the interests of the Indians on their reservations, water claims or otherwise are not interfered with; but they must be guarded and protected in all their rights as is the white man. In all cases, a friendly and brotherly disposition should be nourished towards the lamanites who will be our friends if we do not repulse them."[4]

The movement into Star Valley, Wyoming, was similar, and was accomplished primarily by Cache Valley Saints. Eleven communities were founded in the late 1870s and early 1880s. Another movement at the same time resulted in the founding of a cluster of colonies in San Luis Valley in southwestern Colorado. Most of the early residents there were migrants from Mississippi who, after their conversion to the gospel, wished to locate somewhere in the Mountain West.

The movement into Nevada began in 1864 when a group was called from southern Utah to settle Meadow Valley in east central Nevada. But in the years that followed, group after group went to southern Nevada to settle about a dozen communities to grow cotton and semitropical products, and to supply provisions for travelers on the Spanish Trail toward California.

But the largest and most important movement of the 1870s and early 1880s was directed toward Arizona. The Morman Battalion had passed through that country on its memorable march in 1846 from the Missouri River to the Pacific Coast. After four settlements had been founded in 1876 on the Little Colorado River, other settlements were soon founded on the Gila and Salt rivers. Despite their hard lot initially, these settlers eventually began to prosper, and they provided the foundation for the community of Latter-day Saints in Arizona which now numbers about 200,000. The Udalls, Eyrings, Ellsworth, and Kimballs are all products of this heritage.

OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

With the upper Snake River solidly settled, a group of colonies began in Alberta, Canada. And with many communities now located in Arizona, it was also natural to establish bases in Sonora and Chihuahua in Mexico. These, and colonies in the Hawaiian Islands and elsewhere in the South Pacific, were lonely outposts until the significant Latter-day Saint expansion throughout the Free World after World War II. There are now more LDS stakes in Latin America than in all the world in 1928.

TWENTIETH CENTURY

We should not overlook the significant colonization in this century. In Wyoming and Idaho, for example, many members of the Church moved into the Teton area, primarily from Star Valley, Wyoming; into Magic Valley, after the completion of the Milner Dam in 1905; and into the Boise and Payette areas. Earlier colonies also grew. Some of this expansion was the result of the erection of beet sugar factories by Latter-day Saint and other interests early in the twentieth century. In still more recent times, the opening of new lands for settlement after the completion of reclamation projects has seen considerable numbers of Latter-day Saints move into the American Falls area, Rupert, and Emmett. These provided the foundation for the 200,000 or more Latter-day Saints in Idaho today.

SOME LDS CONTRIBUTIONS TO WESTERN COLONIZATION

Most of the Latter-day Saint colonists in the mountain states and Oregon and Washington were farmers. Latter-day Saints have always been heavily involved in the growing of cattle and horses, wheat and hay, potatoes and peas, and sugarbeets. Some time ago, Kusum Nair, a charming writer and educator from India, who had received a grant from the World Bank to make a study of agriculture in the United States, Japan, and India, suggested a reason for the Latter-day Saint success with these crops. In her prize-winning book, "The Lonely Furrow," there are two chapters on Latter-day Saint farmers. She wrote of one prominent non-Mormon agriculturist in Washington who told her that most Americans could not do irrigated farming. "It is much harder work than other kinds of agriculture," he said. "An American can look big—six feet tall. But he cannot work hard. Now the Orientals and Mormons can do that kind of work. They don't mind it. But not Americans. It's too hard." And he went on to tell Mrs. Nair that the Mormons "learn to do it only because they had to. It was a desert they settled, and there was no place else they could have gone to." Mrs. Nair concludes her two chapters on the Mormons by commending them for their blending of agriculture and religion in what she calls spiritual economics.[5]

Hard work is not the only contribution of Latter-day Saint pioneers to the development of the West. Here are some others:

1. They made persistent efforts through the years to establish friendly relations with Indians, and they have played a significant role in the intellectual, social, economic, and cultural achievements of western Indians in the past generation.

2. They contributed significantly toward the passage of women suffrage in the states of the mountain west in the years before World War I.

3. They helped perpetuate a heritage of economic cooperation, which has helped provide the kind of economic organization necessary to the development of the arid West.

4. They established and maintained cultural facilities and activities: ward schools, stake academies, colleges and universities, dance halls, choirs, theatrical productions, art festivals, classes in literature, and instruction in health and nursing.

Finally, it would be well to remember three general goals of early Latter-day Saint colonists. First, they cultivated a reverence for life and for nature. Even as they crossed the Great Plains, headed for the Salt Lake Valley, they agreed upon a rule that they must be kind to their animals. "The more kind we are to our animals," said President Brigham Young, "the more will peace increase, and the savage nature of the brute creation will vanish away" (in Journal of Discourses, 1:203).

Second, they tried to keep their settlements clean and productive. "Build cities," said President Young, "adorn your habitations, make gardens, orchards, and vineyards, and render the earth so pleasant that when you look upon your labors you may do so with pleasure, and that angels may delight to come and visit your beautiful locations" (in Journal of Discourses, 8:83).

Third, they sought personal development and improvement. This accounts, no doubt, for their heavy investment in education. Elder Parley P. Pratt said: "Here we can cultivate the mind, renew the spirit, invigorate the body, cheer the heart and ennoble the soul of man. Here we can cultivate every science and art calcuated to enlarge the mind, accommodate the body, or polish and adorn our race."[6]

President Bringham Young often said that the way to achieve success as a person, as a family, as a community, as a nation was to work hard, plan well, and trust in God.

That formula, inherent in the success of the Latter-day Saint colonization of the Old West, remains valid for all of us.

THE FED EXCLUDES FARMERS

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, today I want to restate and resubstantiate a charge I made 2 years ago: The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, under the leadership of Paul Volcker, is systematically ignoring the interests of the American farmers by ignoring the law governing the Fed, which calls upon the Board of Governors to represent farmers on the boards of directors of the 12 regional banks in the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. President, all of us in this Chamber are only too aware that high interest rates are damaging, if not devastating, our national economy.

All of us are only too aware that interest rate levels are influenced by, and in fact controlled by, the Fed.

Perhaps too few of us are aware, however, that in our efforts to affect the nature of the policy coming out of the Fed and its Board of Governors, we ought to take a look at what and who make that policy.

During the spring of 1980, the first planting season for farmers following the advent of the Fed's fall 1979 tight money and high interest rate policy, rates crippled farmers throughout Tennessee and across the Nation. Farmers told me they were foregoing plantings, selling off equipment or foreclosing because of high interest rates.

Farmers who have stuck with their vocation through the continued, unyielding, high interest rate policies of the Fed, are rolling up enormous burdens of debt.

It was during that spring of 1980 that I asked the Library of Congress to survey the Federal Reserve Board and its regional banks and determine just how many farmers were represented on the board. It seems plainly obvious that the presence of farmers in the Fed's decisionmaking apparatus should help to make policy more sensitive to the interests of farmers.

The law governing the organization of the Federal Reserve System indeed encourages such representation. Aside from the Fed's seven-member board, the system has 12 regional banks, each with nine directors.

There are three classes of members, A, B, and C.

Class A members represent the stockholding banks in the districts. This does not exclude farmers.

Class B and C directors are to be appointed with "due but not exclusive consideration to the interests of agriculture, commerce, industry, services, labor, and consumers." Class B and C members constitute 72 of the 108 directors across the Nation.

Most significant is that class C members, 36 of the directors, are appointed by Paul Volcker and his colleagues on the Fed's Board of Governors.

With such a mandate from law and with such varied representation possible among the 12 regional banks across the Nation, I thought it reasonable to expect to find a healthy representation of farmers on the boards of the regional banks.

But in May 1980, the Library of Congress found just three farmers across the United States serving as directors in the Federal Reserve System's regional banks. Three. That is 2.77 percent of the directorships.

And there are, of course, no farmers on the Board of Governors itself. In fact, the last person with farming as a principal interest who served on the Board of Governors was appointed by President Eisenhower.

This prompted many of us in the Senate to urge Presidential consideration of a farmer—or some other small business owner—for the next vacancy on the Fed's Board of Governors, and for more farmers and small business owners on the boards of the regional banks.

Last month, 2 years after the survey, I asked the Library of Congress to update the 1980 survey in order to track the improvement of the situation.

The result? No change. Still three farmers in the entire system.

Most aggravating is that there are no farmers among the class C directors at the regional banks. This shows that Paul Volcker and his colleagues on the Board of Governors have systematically excluded farmers from the category of appointments for which they are responsible.

Moreover, if you survey the 36 members appointed by the Board, and at the entire 108 directorships across the Nation, you will be hard pressed to find a small business owner or operator of any type—homebuilder, car dealer, travel agent, realtor—nor will you be able to locate anyone who is representative of labor or the consumer in general.

Just what do we have to do to convince the Board of Governors to broaden the range of voices and opinions which influence its policy?

Mr. President, I submit to those who claim that it is not the province of the Congress to suggest or mandate policy to the independent and autonomous Federal Reserve System that they carefully look at those who make up the "independent and autonomous" Federal Reserve System. It appears that they are independent of, and autonomous from, any voice or input by the farmer, the small business owner, the homebuilder, the auto dealer, the realtor, the worker, the consumer—just about anyone and everyone who make up the definition of borrower in this Nation.

Once again, I want to call upon the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and Chairman Volcker specifically, to heed the spirit and text of the statute which gives the Fed its autonomy, to take all due steps to increase the representation of farmers and other sectors of the American economy now excluded from membership on the boards of directors of the regional banks of the Federal Reserve System.

I ask unanimous consent that the Library of Congress survey be printed in the RECORD, and I would like to commend the diligence and thoroughness of Roger White, a specialist in the economics division at the Congressional Research Service in the Library of Congress, for his work in preparation of both the 1980 and 1982 surveys.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Subject: Federal Reserve officials with agricultural interests.

Your request concerns agricultural backgrounds of current members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and directors of the twelve regional Federal Reserve Banks. This response makes reference to findings on the same subject reported to your office in a memorandum dated May 28, 1980, a copy of which is attached. That memorandum outlined the development of statutory provisions which require consideration of agricultural interests in making appointments to the Board of Governors and to the boards of directors of the Federal Reserve Banks.

In May 1980, we noted agricultural backgrounds of varying degrees for 10 of the 60 individuals who had served on the Board of Governors. None of the 10 were in office in May 1980. Since then, one appointment has been made to the Board. Federal Reserve releases providing background information on the new member, Dr. Preston Martin, do not indicate any direct experience with the agricultural sector.

Each Federal Reserve Bank has a board of directors with 9 positions, for which the terms of office are 3 years. For all 12 banks, there are 108 positions. Statutory provisions for appointments to 72 of these positions require "due but not exclusive consideration to the interests of agriculture, commerce, industry, services, labor and consumers." In May 1980, we noted that 3 directors might be considered to have principal occupations in agriculture. Of the 72 "covered" positions, 50 are filled in June 1982 by directors who have been appointed or reappointed since May 1980. Directors serving in June 1982 include 3 who might be considered to have principal occupations in agriculture. These directors, their Federal Reserve banks and information about principal occupations are as follows:

Mary Garst, Chicago, manager of cattle division, Garst Company (farming, cow-calf, feeder lot).

William L. Mathers, Minneapolis, President, Mathers Land Company, Inc. (ranching and farming).

Fred W. Andrew, San Francisco, President and Chief Executive Officer, Superior Farming Company (diversified farming organization).

In addition, three directors have principal business affiliations with firms which specialize in marketing or processing agricultural products. These are Jean McArthur Davis (Atlanta), John D. Anderson (Cleveland) and John F. Anderson (Kansas City). Two directors are educators who appear to have agricultural-related areas of expertise: William H. Stroube (St. Louis) and J. Wayland Bennett (Dallas). Please note that we do not have information about agricultural interests or backgrounds of directors other than principal business affiliation.

Attached, for your reference, is a copy of a master list of directors of Federal Reserve Banks. Please let us know of if we can be of further assistance (287-7593).

Your request concerns agricultural backgrounds of members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and of directors of the 12 regional Federal Reserve Banks. This memorandum presents statutory provisions relating to representation of agricultural interests on the Board of Governors and on the boards of directors of the regional banks. In addition, it provides information on agriculture related backgrounds of those who have served on the Board of Governors and its predecessor, the Federal Reserve Board, from 1914 to date and of those who have been in office as directors of the regional Federal Reserve Banks for selected periods since 1950. Biographical sketches containing references to agricultural interests and backgrounds appear in appendices, with those for past and present Board members beginning on page 7, and those for current directors beginning on page 18.

MEMBERS OF THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

From 1914 to 1936, the principal policy making body within the Federal Reserve System was known as the Federal Reserve Board. In 1936, the Board was reconstituted and renamed as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The Federal Reserve Act initially provided for 5 appointive members, and was amended in 1922 to provide for one additional appointive member. Throughout the 1914-1936 period, the Act granted ex officio membership to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. The 1922 amendment included a change relating to backgrounds of appointive members, calling for the President, in making appointments, to have "due regard to a fair representation of financial, agricultural, industrial and commercial interests, and geographical divisions of the country." This phrase replaced original language which read as follows: "due regard to a fair representation of the different commercial, industrial and geographical divisions of the country."

The next change made in statutory requirements concerning the composition of the Board is also the most recent. The Banking Act of 1935 changed the title of the Board to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, removed ex officio members from the Board and provided for 7 appointive members. Provisions enacted in 1922 concerning the backgrounds of members of the Board were retained by the Banking Act of 1935.

Other provisions regarding the appointment and qualifications of members of the Board appear in a CRS report on the subject.[1]

On reviewing biographical sketches of past and present members, we have noted agricultural backgrounds of varying degrees for 10 of the 60 individuals who have served as appointive members. We, of course, cannot assess the intent of those nominating and confirming these or other members of the Board with respect to providing for fair representation of agricultural interests. The 10 members, the Federal Reserve districts from which they were appointed and their years of service are as follows:

Milo D. Campbell, Chicago, March 14, 1923 to March 22, 1923.

Edward H. Cunningham, Chicago, May 14, 1923 to November 28, 1930.

Eugene Meyer, New York, September 16, 1930 to May 10, 1933.

Wayland W. Magee, Kansas City, May 18, 1931 to January 24, 1933.

Ralph W. Morrison, Dallas, February 10, 1936 to August 9, 1936.

Chester C. Davis, Richmond, June 25, 1936 to April 15, 1941.

Rudolph M. Evans, Richmond, March 14, 1942 to August 13, 1954.

Paul E. Miller, Minneapolis, August 13, 1954 to October 21, 1954.

Chas. N. Shepardson, Dallas, March 17, 1955 to April 30, 1967.

G. H. King, Jr., Atlanta, March 25, 1959 to September 18, 1963.

Copies of biographical sketches of these 10 members, obtained from the Board, are appended to this memorandum.

DIRECTORS OF REGIONAL FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

The Federal Reserve Act provides for 9 directors for each of the 12 regional Federal Reserve Banks. Each board of directors consists of an equal number of Class A, Class B, and Class C directors. Provisions concerning qualifications and appointment differ among the director classes. Mention of agricultural interests appeared in initial Federal Reserve Act provisions for Class B directors and appear in the Act as amended by Public Law 95-188 in connection with both Class B and Class C directors. Relevant provisions, excerpted from section 4 of the Federal Reserve Act are set forth below with additions or changes effected by Public Law 95-188 denoted by italic:

Paragraph 10: Class A shall consist of three members, without discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color, sex, or national origin, who shall be chosen by and be representative of the stockholding banks.

Paragraph 11: Class B shall consist of three members, who shall represent the public and shall be elected without discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color, sex, or national origin, and with due but not exclusive consideration to the interests of agriculture, commerce, industry, services, labor, and consumers. [underlined portion replaced original language which read as follows: who at the time of their election shall be actively engaged in their district in commerce, agriculture or some other industrial pursuit.]

Paragraph 12: Class C shall consist of three members who shall be designated by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. They shall be elected to represent the public, without discrimination on the basis of race, creed, color, sex, or national origin, and with due but not exclusive consideration to the interests of agriculture, commerce, industry, service, labor, and consumers . . .

Characteristics of directors serving the regional Federal Reserve Banks during selected periods have been examined in several studies. A study which appeared in the December 1973 issue of the Social Science Quarterly includes data on characteristics of Class B and Class C directors appointed or reappointed during the 21 year period 1950 to 1970.[2] In this study, each director was classified according to his primary economic activity or occupation, such classification being made on the basis of principal business address. Thirteen occupational classes used included agriculture, extractive industry (mining and drilling), manufacturing and academic. Of the 252 appointments and reappointments made to Class B positions during the 21 year period, 16 were classified as having agriculture as their principal occupation. For the same number of Class C positions, there were 11 classed under agriculture. The total number of director positions for the 21 year period, including Class A directors who represent member banks, was 756, 27 of whom, or 3.6 percent, were classed as having agriculture as their principal occupation.

A study published in the June 1972 Federal Reserve Bulletin, prepared by Andrew F. Brimmer, a member of Board of Governors at that time, analyzes characteristics of directors of the regional Federal Reserve Banks as of January 1, 1972.[3] In classifying "industrial origins of directors, 1972", this study used 13 industrial classifications similar to those used in the study discussed above. Of 108 directors serving as of January 1, 1972, 4 or 3.7 percent, were classed as having agriculture as their industry origin.

We have obtained copies of the Federal Reserve's Form 242 "Director's Biographical Sketch" for each of the directors currently in office. Our review of this information, which follows, does not constitute an assessment of whether or not there has been due consideration to the interests of agriculture in selecting directors.

Three of the current directors, all Class B, appear to have agriculture as their principal industrial occupations. Three positions constitute 2.8 percent of the total 108 directorship positions. These directors, their Federal Reserve banks and information on principal occupations are as follows:

Mary Garst, Chicago, Cattle Manager, The Garst Company (nature of business: agriculture-farming, cow-calf, feedlot, chemical, fertilizer).

Donald P. Helgeson, Minneapolis, Secretary-Treasurer, Jack Frost, Inc. (nature of business: agribusiness-integrated poultry, grain elevators and food distribution—180 employees, 160 contract farmers).

Alan Roy Sleeper, Kansas City, Company name: Alan R. Sleeper (nature of business: livestock and ranching, investments).

In addition, the biographical sketches contain information indicating varying degrees of background and interest in agriculture for 11 directors who would be classed as having other principal industrial occupations. These include directors who earned degrees in agriculture or agricultural economics but are employed in banking, educators whose fields of expertise are in agriculture, and those who own farms but list unrelated principal business affiliations. Copies of the biographical sketches of these 11 directors and of the 3 referred to above are appended, grouped by Federal Reserve districts.

Please let us know if we can be of further assistance.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

If not, morning business is closed.

TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1982

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of H.R. 4961, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4961) to make miscellaneous changes in the tax laws, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator DOLE has 4 hours and 32 minutes on the bill. Senator LONG has 4 hours and 44 minutes on the bill. Amendment No. 1972 is pending. Senator DOLE has 25 minutes and 50 seconds on the amendment. Senator FORD has 14 minutes, 31 seconds on the amendment.

Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I see the distinguished majority whip is on the floor. Some of the proponents and opponents of my amendment are not here. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that we have a quorum call that will not be charged to either side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in order.

Mr. FORD. Since the distinguished Senator from Alaska is here, I would not want to do anything that would disrupt his schedule.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have no objection to a quorum call with the time charged equally for the time being. Is that what the Senator wishes to do?

Mr. FORD. No, Mr. President, I do not have very much time. I see the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is here.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to have a quorum call at this point without charging it to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

AMENDMENT NO. 1972

(Purpose: To eliminate the provisions which increase the excise tax on cigarettes)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the Ford amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator from North Carolina wish to be recognized at this time?

Mr. HELMS. Only briefly, I would say to my friend from Kansas, because I assume we want to get to a vote on this amendment.

Who is in control of the time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I have approximately 14 minutes left, and I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would be happy to yield whatever time the Senator needs.

Mr. FORD. The Senator from Kansas has 25 minutes left, I believe. I yield whatever time the Senator from North Carolina needs.

Mr. HELMS. I am grateful to both Senators for yielding to me, and for their many other courtesies.

Mr. FORD. I might say to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina that I was listening to the radio this morning and they were discussing great Americans. Today is the birthday of a great American, the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE). Since it is his birthday, I hope he continues to be as good to us during this day as he has been throughout these proceedings. I wish him a happy birthday and many happy returns.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. President, it would seriously disrupt the Senate if I attempted to sing "Happy Birthday" to BOB DOLE. Once you have heard me sing you would know what I mean. I can scarcely carry a tune in a basket. However, I do wish my good friend from Kansas, as they say in North Carolina, many more happy returns. He is a great Senator and a great friend.

Mr. President, consumers of tobacco already bear an inordinate share of taxes imposed by all levels of government—a fact that has eluded the awareness of a great many people who are inclined to vote "against tobacco" on any and every occasion. I do not know of any other commodity that is as overtaxed as tobacco. The 100-percent increase in the Federal excise tax on cigarettes proposed by this bill would cause undue hardship to the 55 million Americans who choose to smoke, as well as the 276,000 family farmers who depend on tobacco for their livelihoods.

Of course, I have a provincial interest in this. I confess it. Forty thousand to 45,000 of those 276,000 farm families are in my State of North Carolina. I will not go into a recitation of all the economic aspects of this issue. I have done that time and time again.

Proponents of increased cigarette taxes have maintained over the years that people should not smoke and therefore the additional tax burden serves them right. Mr. President, is this not a little bit of an elitist position? The fact is that this is a regressive tax—one that falls hardest on the less affluent people of our society, requiring them to pay a larger proportionate share of the taxes required to support the operation of not only the Federal Government but State and local governments as well.

Most hurt by this increase are not those with comfortable incomes who can afford the extra expense, but those with modest incomes—the working people of this country. This regressive cigarette tax will force poorer people who use tobacco to pay a larger proportional share of the revenues.

Mr. President, supporters of this increase point out that the Federal excise tax on cigarettes has not increased since 1951. That is true. But those who attempt to justify this proposed increase with such an argument are overlooking the fact that Federal excise tax collections have almost doubled from $1.3 billion to $2.5 billion a year.

Also, States have increased excise tax rates on cigarettes from 3 cents to 13.4 cents, almost 350 percent. State tax revenues on cigarettes, including sales tax, shot up from $466 million in 1951 to nearly $4.4 billion in 1981, a rise of more than 800 percent. Clearly, tobacco has been an easy target over the years, and lawmakers have not hesitated to single out this commodity to bear an inordinately heavy tax burden.

Tobacco consumers already pay $7 billion more in Federal, State, and local taxes per year than do nonsmokers. The Federal cigarette excise tax is among the highest imposed on any product in the United States—6.5 times higher than the Federal tax on wine, 3.7 times the tax on gasoline, 1.8 to 3.7 times of the tax on tires, 2.2 times the tax on airline tickets, and 1.6 times the tax on beer.

Mr. President, the effect this proposal could have on our economy is devastating. The negative impact of this increase will render the Federal excise tax an inefficient and costly method of raising revenue because of the trade-off between tax revenue gains and business income or productivity losses. Doubling the cigarette tax rate will not have a corresponding result on the amount of revenue collected and will cause untold difficulty in threatening jobs, earnings, productivity, and economic growth of the tobacco industry and its supporting industries. The estimated ripple effect of such a tax increase is based on the expected decline in demand as it effects business revenue and therefore basic income or value added, which included the effects on salaries and wages as part of operating costs. The main supporting sectors that will be affected are advertising, paper, fuels, chemicals and plastics, several business service sectors and tobacco processing, containers trucking, storage and distributors.

My State of North Carolina will perhaps bear the brunt of the negative impact of this tax increase. The economic effect will be far reaching, not only in North Carolina, but other States as well. Estimates have been made as to the number of jobs, State revenue, and so forth that will be lost due to this proposed increase and the consequences to my State and the Nation must not be ignored.

One of the main problems with this tax increase that must be considered is that it will severely threaten present and future State revenues from tobacco sales. It has been estimated that there will be an overall decline of $358 million in State revenues due to a decrease in demand. States have become more dependent on cigarette excise taxes to finance various programs. In fact, cigarette taxes are six times more important as a source of revenue for the States than for the Federal Government. Local governments are also deriving a significant portion of their income from cigarette taxes. Almost 400 cities and counties now tax cigarettes for a total of nearly $164 million in 1981. The decrease in this revenue due to the expected drop in demand will incur yet another difficulty for financially hard pressed local governments. It is clear that the punitive effects of such a tax increase will extend far beyond the smoker and small family farmer.

A recent study by the Wharton Applied Research Center of the University of Pennsylvania shows that tobacco and tobacco products generate $57.6 billion annually toward the gross national product. Tobacco's contribution to America's GNP is roughly 2½ times net expenditures on the industry's products, demonstrating dramatically the magnitude of tobacco's indirect effect on the national economy. The negative effects of doubling the excise tax on cigarettes, as I have already stated, could be devastating.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to accept my amendment and reject this proposed unreasonable and disruptive attempt to penalize the consumers of tobacco in this country. I ask unanimous consent that a list of the negative effects to North Carolina which I have described be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEGATIVE EFFECTS TO NORTH CAROLINA OF AN 8-CENT INCREASE IN THE FEDERAL CIGARETTE EXCISE TAX

In 1963, the following adverse economic effects are likely [1] to occur in North Carolina:

A decline in the cigarette industry's basic income of about $168 million.

A decrease in all supporting industries' basic income of about $130 million.

A decrease in the basic income of tobacco growers and their supporting firms of $58 million.

An expected decline in state cigarette tax revenues of $2 million.

A drop in wholesale/retail/supporting firms' income of $11.5 million.

Without any additional compensating nontax increases in price, a loss in wholesale and supporting sector employment of 325 workers associated with the basic income losses, to reduce operating costs, including losses in salaries and wages of $6.3 million.

To reduce the productivity losses and operating costs without any compensating cigarette price increases, layoffs would also occur in the other industries indentified above.

The total decline in annual basic income (i.e. value added) and state tax revenues outlined here would amount to $370 million from the expected effects for North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kentucky for yielding to me, and I promise support for his amendment.

Mr. FORD. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) be added as cosponsors of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. D'AMATO). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(By request of Mr. FORD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have supported many provisions of this tax bill, because I believe this bill eliminates many inequities in the tax law which favor large corporations and special interests. But I cannot support the provision in this bill that raises almost $5 billion over the next 3 years by doubling the Federal excise tax on cigarettes.

I do not smoke, so no one should take this as an endorsement of smoking. But I am opposed to increasing Federal revenues by singling out one class of citizens—in this case the cigarette smokers in the country—and making them pay a disproportionate share of the tax burden.

The basic issue is one of fairness and equity. I and many of my colleagues have spoken against other provisions of this bill because they will hurt the middle class or the poor. I believe that the tobacco tax increase is one of the worst and most inequitable of all those provisions.

The cigarette tax now in existence of 8 cents per pack is already a regressive tax, and the 16-cent per pack tax proposed by this bill would make it even more regressive. Obviously it is harder for a person making $10,000 or less to pay that tax than it is for someone making $40,000. This tax is not proposed as a deterrent to smoking, because study after study has shown that people who smoke will continue to smoke even if taxes are increased.

This is a very real tax increase for the individual who does smoke. A recent article in Tax Notes, dated January 25, 1982, noted that the effect of this excise tax increase on cigarettes will have the effect of wiping out the tax cuts that have been so ballyhooed by the Reagan administration. As that article states:

> Any use of higher excise tax rates to make up for revenue losses resulting from the kind of income tax reductions legislated last year will give rise to a net further shift of overall tax burdens away from the upper income portions of the population and toward less affluent families . . . the burden of increased excises will fall with particular severity upon poor families.

Mr. President, I have been concerned about the costs to the taxpayer of the tobacco farm price support program. And I have been concerned about the inequities of the archaic allotment program as it applies to Fluecured tobacco. I still have some criticisms of that program, but I believe that many of those concerns have been addressed and the program has been much reformed in the past 2 years. In my State of Ohio, we have 11,470 families who make their living from tobacco in one way or another, so I am concerned about that program.

But I believe the tax increase proposed here will have a negative impact on those tobacco growers far beyond the impact of any reforms that have been instituted in the tobacco program.

Finally, I am opposed to this tax increase on cigarettes because I believe it sets a bad precedent for the tax bills to follow. If the Republican majority is willing to increase taxes on cigarettes, then next it will raise taxes on liquor, on beer, on energy, and on numerous other consumer taxes. Those consumer taxes are regressive and especially hit the poor and working families. Yet they are being imposed, while families in the upper incomes will see their overall tax burden lessened. We must have fairness and equity in the Tax Code. While I support many of the efforts in this bill to move toward tax fairness, I believe the provision to double the cigarette excise tax is a step in the wrong direction, and I must strongly oppose it.●

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I understood that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina would like to have a few minutes, and I am more than pleased to yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I support the Amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky striking the increase for excise tax on cigarettes.

The Finance Committee proposal to raise excise taxes on cigarettes by 100 percent will have a disproportionate and regressive effect on our tax structure. It will increase the already substantial tax burden levied on the blue-collar worker and low and middle income taxpayers who constitute the majority of today's smoking population.

Mr. President, the increase will severely hamper the revenue raising capability of our State governments. To the extent that this dramatic increase in Federal excise taxes reduces consumption of tobacco products, it will thereby reduce the amount of revenues collected by State treasuries from excise taxes imposed on cigarettes at the State level.

Mr. President, in this Senator's judgment, the Finance Committee acted unwisely in implementing a 100-percent increase in cigarette excise taxes. It is unfair to single out one industry for such a harsh increase. For this reason, and the ones I noted previously, I believe this effort to strike the excise tax on tobacco is well founded. I strongly support this amendment, and I hope my colleagues will go on record in support of this amendment, also.

I thank the Senator from Kentucky for yielding.

Mr. FORD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining on my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes and fifty seconds.

Mr. FORD. I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, I understand well these proceedings and the package that has been put together.

Last week, we saw this body single out tobacco as the only agricultural commodity to be produced at no net cost to the Federal Government. The farmers of our States who raise tobacco will be required to pay their own way. What other agricultural commodity is required to bear that responsibility? None.

Today, we see the imposition of a 100-percent increase in the excise tax on a pack of cigarettes, from 8 cents to 16 cents.

Kentucky is the second largest payer of excise taxes in the country. A small State like Kentucky is the second largest payer of excise taxes in the country.

We have 81,000 jobs related to the tobacco industry. The income this year will be roughly $916 million. That is the only thing that is keeping our agricultural community's head above the economic water.

Doubling the excise tax, if the Senate sees fit to do so, will reduce consumption approximately 5 percent. As that consumption decline ripples through the economy it will mean that those 81,000 related jobs will be reduced by approximately 5,000. So we stand to lose, in Kentucky alone, 5,000 jobs. At a time when unemployment is rising, and agriculture in particular is suffering, this minuscule effort to help balance the budget is just not worth the attendant costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. FORD. I yield myself 1 minute. It is estimated that that same 5-percent-consumption decline will cause our State to lose more than $50 million in income.

At a time when the agricultural community is experiencing a significant increase in bankruptcies and foreclosures, we in the U.S. Senate, as a result of this 100-percent increase in taxes, will be causing more bankruptcies and foreclosures; we will be eliminating more jobs and income; we will be applying more hardship on the tobacco industry and farmers of Kentucky.

These are economic hard times, but we insist on increasing the economic hard times on the agricultural community of my State and the 22 other tobacco-raising States.

We give billions of dollars to people who do not want to work and who will not work. Yet we say to the farming community of my State and others, those who want to work, "We are going to make it even harder on you to make a living; make it even harder on you to get by."

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Virginia wish time?

Mr. WARNER. In just a minute, yes.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) is not a cosponsor, I wish his name to also be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President. I understand the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) wishes to speak. I yield 5 minutes or whatever time he requires.

Mr. WARNER. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. President, I support my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) and others in this effort supporting this amendment.

This amendment will have a very severe impact on the fiscal situation in my State of Virginia as well as other States. There will be an adverse impact on jobs in all parts of the industry.

This industry has grown up in the State of Virginia through generations, and the abruptness of this tax would just be devastating to persons who have carefully through many years invested their incomes and their lives.

If corrections are to be made, they should be made in a gradual way and not in such an abrupt way as proposed by this tax.

For example, in 1983, the following adverse economic effects are predicted:

A decline in the cigarette industry's basic income of about $370 million;

A decrease in all supporting industries' basic income of $290 million;

A decrease in the basic income of tobacco growers and their supporting firms of $136 million;

An expected decline in State cigarette tax revenues of $358 million;

A drop in wholesale/retail/supporting firms' income of $310 million;

Without any additional compensating nontax increases in price, a loss in wholesale and supporting sector employment of 8,830 workers associated with the basic income losses, to reduce operating costs, including losses in salaries and wages of $172 million.

To reduce the productivity losses and operating costs without any compensating cigarette price increases, layoffs would also occur in the other industries identified above.

The total decline in annual basic income—that is, value added—and State tax revenues outlined here would amount to $1,458 million from the expected effects for:

A decline in the cigarette industry's basic income of about $125 million;

A decrease in all supporting industries' basic income of $97.3 million;

A decrease in the basic income of tobacco growers and their supporting firms of $8.2 million;

An expected decline in State cigarette tax revenues of $1.75 million;

A drop in wholesale/retail/supporting firms' income of $8.3 million;

Without any additional compensating nontax increases in price, a loss in wholesale and supporting sector employment of 235 workers associated with the basic income losses, to reduce operating costs, including losses in salaries and wages of $4.6 million;

To reduce the productivity losses and operating costs without any compensating cigarette price increases, layoffs would also occur in the other industries identified above;

The total decline in annual basic income—that is, value added—and State tax revenues outlined here would amount to $240 million from the expected effects for Virginia.

The likely effect is based on the tax increase being considered as a real or greater-than-inflation net increase in price. A minimum effect would be based on deflating the price increase by the consumer price index to estimate the net price increase, on the assumption that consumers view the tax increase as mainly inflationary in its effect. A deflated tax will also have significant negative effects on demand, income and employment.

Mr. President, these statistics provide a very solid case for viewing this tax as having a very severe, adverse economic impact on those States that historically have supported this industry. It is for that reason that I strongly support this amendment, and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

In the years to come perhaps we can make some adjustments but certainly not in the abrupt manner as now provided in the bill before the Senate.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FORD. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficent second? There is a sufficent second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, whatever time I have remaining I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.).

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, doubling the cigarette tax as proposed by the Committee on Finance is, in my judgment, unwise and unjustified.

I shall support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) of which I am a cosponsor.

I say again I think it is unreasonable and unjustified to consider doubling the tax on cigarettes.

Mr. FORD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the junior Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST) is on his way to the Chamber and wishes to speak on the amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it be charged to my time on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I do not believe I have time left, maybe a minute or less, to yield to the Senator from North Carolina, but I would be glad to do that. I understand the distinguished floor manager of the bill would be willing to allow some time in the event the distinguished Senator needs it. So I yield whatever time I have and the rest will be yielded by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes of my time to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. That will be adequate time. I greatly appreciate the floor manager and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky allowing me a few minutes to speak on behalf of the amendment proposed by the very able Senator from the State of Kentucky.

It is a great pleasure for me to join him as a cosponsor of the amendment concerning the excise tax upon cigarettes. There are several points I would like to stress for my colleagues here in making my argument.

First of all, as we all know, a tax of this kind is regressive. It hits the ordinary citizen the hardest. I think that in and of itself makes it a bad tax. I think in times of recession to double a tax upon a particular commodity is ill-advised and difficult to defend.

Second, Mr. President, you run the risk with any commodity when you continue to increase the tax on it of finally beginning to affect the sales of it. So actually you are counterproductive in your policy. You have reduced the flow of revenue.

I would like to point out to my colleagues, Mr. President, that since 1951 the States in this country have increased the tax on the sale of cigarettes by 350 percent. It is pretty high. Now we are proposing to increase it by 100 percent in terms of the Federal tax from 8 cents to 16 cents a pack.

You are finally going to so burden this commodity that people will not be able to buy it or will reduce sales and, hence, you dry up the source of revenue for State governments as well as the Federal Government.

I submit, Mr. President, although I know this is not the intention, that we have reached the point here in tax policy with regard to tobacco where it is punitive. It is rooted, frankly, in some cases in hysteria, and I think we ought to call it for what it is. If you want to prohibit smoking in this country then face it head-on and be honest about it. Then let us have a prohibition. But do not use the revenue and the tax policies and powers of the U.S. Congress to accomplish that end.

So, Mr. President, I simply submit this tax is ill-advised, it is going to be hurtful to one of the great industries of this country, a legal industry, an honorable industry.

I have the pleasure of representing one of the States that is very vitally affected. I come from North Carolina, and in the eastern part of the State where I reside we are in the heart of the Flue-cured tobacco-producing area. It is a vital component of our economy. It is the undergirding of the entire tobacco industry in our State, which is our number one industry in terms of buying, exporting, and manufacturing, and we are proud of it.

It has a long history and it is here to stay. We do not like to see the tax policies of the U.S. Government go about dismantling it in this punitive fashion.

As the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has pointed out, there are 22 States in the United States that deal in the growing of tobacco. Again it is an integral part of the economy of this country.

In conclusion, I note, Mr. President, that over $6 billion a year is raised in revenue today at the State, local, and Federal levels by the taxes upon tobacco, and if they do not stop piling on more and more, Mr. President, again I repeat, we are going to kill the goose that is laying the golden egg.

So the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky makes good sense from many perspectives, and it is my pleasure to speak on behalf of it.

I commend him for offering it and I urgently ask my colleagues to support it. I thank the Chair and I thank the floor leader of this bill, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for yielding me time to speak on behalf of it.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am going to vote for the amendment to remove the cigarette excise tax increase from the Finance Committee bill.

I will do so for reasons perhaps not considered by my colleagues and so I will take a moment to call these considerations to the attention of the Senate.

Last January, President Reagan in his State of the Union message proposed a bold plan for realining responsibilities in our federal system of Government. This plan is based on the President's long standing desire to return programs and tax resources to State and local government.

The President's plan would call on States to take over some 40 programs that are currently financed in part by the Federal Government. To make sure that States have the financial resources to take on these programs entirely, the President also proposed that the Federal Government give up certain tax sources. One of these taxes is the excise tax on tobacco. This tax is currently used by most of the States. It can be easily imposed by a State and so is a likely candidate for transfer along with program responsibilities.

Sometime later this month the President will be sending a message to the Congress spelling out the details of his New Federalism plan. That plan will call for a return of the tobacco tax to the States. I do not think it is helpful to the prospects for a New Federalism to have the Senate increasing—doubling—the very tax that the President is promising to turn back to the States.

The New Federalism is an important initiative. It is a program that the American people will support because it promises to make Government programs more accountable to the taxpayers concerns. But achieving a new Federal partnership will be a difficult undertaking for the Congress. I think we are making an especially bad start if our first step is to double the cigarette tax at the same time the President is promising to repeal the tax so that States can use this revenue source to finance new responsibilities.

So, Mr. President, I would urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment by the Senator from Kentucky to strike from the committee's bill the increase in the excise tax on cigarettes by 8 cents.

I do this with mixed feelings. I believe that the cigarette tax should be increased in light of the fact that it has not been increased since 1951, so that it now represents a far smaller portion of the purchase price of a pack of cigarettes than it did 30 years ago. It is clear that some increase in the excise tax on cigarettes is in order.

However, I am troubled by the magnitude of the increase in the Finance Committee's bill. Doubling the cigarette tax is a larger one-step increase than I think is fair to those in our society who smoke. Any increase in an excise tax is a regressive tax increase because it falls disproportionately on middle-income and low-income people. But this 8 cents increase magnifies that regressivity much more than is fair.

I believe that an increase in the tax of 4 cents would strike the appropriate balance between the need for increased revenue to deal with our budgetary situation and the requirements of fairness. I would hope that the Finance Committee would accept such an amendment if it is offered.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished manager of the bill, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time being charged to his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1111

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are going to have a vote in just 1 minute, but there is one minor amendment that is of interest to Senators GOLDWATER and CANNON. It is at no cost to the Treasury. it has been cleared with Senator LONG. I wonder if we might ask unanimous consent to temporarily set-aside the Ford amendment and bring up the amendment by the distinguished Senators GOLDWATER and CANNON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYAKAWA). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), for Senators GOLDWATER and CANNON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1111:

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from South Carolina may proceed.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this amendment to the pending tax bill is a simple one, as well as one that I believe deals fairly with the industries which would be impacted by the proposed excise tax increases.

The purpose of this amendment is to raise the present rate of excise taxes on cigarettes by 50 percent, along with raising the rate of excise taxes on distilled spirits by approximately 31 percent.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order. Will the Senator suspend? Let us get order in the Senate so that we can hear the explanation of the Senator's amendment. I hope the Chair will insist upon order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order so we can hear the amendment being proposed by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. THURMOND. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, this arrangement is estimated to generate the following amounts of revenue for the Federal Treasury: $1.25 billion in fiscal year 1983; $1.86 billion in 1984; $1.87 billion in 1985; $1.9 billion in 1986; and $1.93 billion in 1987. These figures almost identically match and even slightly exceed the Finance Committee's estimated revenues for the 100-percent increase in excise tax on cigarettes alone.

Mr. President, while I recognize the fact that the 100-percent excise tax on cigarettes is a means of assisting in our current budgetary problems, I do not feel that tobacco should be singled out for such an increase. The Finance Committee proposal is unfair to the users and producers of tobacco products. It is well known that many, if not most, smokers are "blue collar" workers and low- and middle-income taxpayers.

Mr. President, can we have order? Can the Chair rap harder?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is correct. The Senate is not in order. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. THURMOND. They are the ones who would ultimately bear the disproportionate burden of this tax increase. I am also greatly concerned about the effect this precipitous tax increase will have on the thousands of small tobacco farmers who depend so heavily on this product for their livelihood. They are the ones who would have the most to lose from this tax increase, for any reduction in the demand for cigarette products would ultimately be passed on to the farmer-growers in the form of lower prices for their product, resulting in a diminished income for tobacco farmers and their families.

For this reason, I am proposing that the recommended increase in tobacco excise taxes be limited to 50 percent, with the balance of the revenue to be achieved by an increase in the excise tax on alcoholic beverages. It should also be pointed out that just as the Federal excise tax on cigarettes has not been increased in almost three decades, so has the Federal excise tax on alcoholic beverages remained unchanged for the same length of time. Thus, if the argument is made that it is time to adjust the excise tax on cigarettes for the effect of three decades of inflation, that same argument applies with equal force to beverage alcohol.

Mr. President, it is an accepted fact that when a person smokes, the only life he directly endangers is his own, but when a person drinks to excess, other members of his family and society, in addition to the consumer, pay the price for his abuse. It is an unfortunate fact that approximately 26,000 American men, women, and children are killed in drunk driving incidents each year. Additionally, 750,000 Americans suffer crippling and other serious injuries every year in drunk driving incidents.

Mr. President, it is a sad fact that one out of every two Americans will be involved in some way in an alcohol-related auto crash in his or her lifetime. It is also a fact that drunk driving is responsible for the most common form of violent death in the Nation.

Mr. President, alcohol abuse also imposes massive economic costs upon today's society. Billions of dollars are lost each year due to health and medical expenses incurred from prolonged alcohol use, motor vehicle accidents—which I have previously mentioned—violent crimes attributed to liquor consumption, and social responses needed to care for those who suffer mental difficulties due to alcohol abuse.

Mr. President, I could continue on this subject indefinitely, but I believe that each Member of this body fully realizes the problems that alcohol abuse causes in our society. I fully realize, and do not take lightly the fact that tobacco use also entails adverse health ramifications to those who partake of this habit excessively. That is why I feel that my amendment is fair and equitable. It applies an equal increase to both products, measured in terms of estimated tax revenue. It also allows the Federal Treasury to acquire the revenue needed to help meet the current budgetary problems we face.

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will study this amendment and that they will be able to support it. It will, in my judgment, be a substantial improvement in the tax package, one that is fair and equitable to all those concerned.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be pleased to yield to the able Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I shall be brief, I am delighted to cosponsor the pending amendment offered by the distinguished and able Senator from South Carolina because it is on its face fair and equitable.

We have been up and down the road about the inordinate burden being put upon one commodity, tobacco.

As the Senator says, to leave unscathed the No. 1 killer, alcohol, as far as I am concerned, is unthinkable when one considers the violence and the broken homes that result from liquor and other alcoholic beverages.

Mr. President, there is a delightful gentleman down in North Carolina. I think the Senator has met him. He is a prominent attorney from the Sand Hills area of North Carolina, and he is a much-sought-after dinner speaker. His name is H. F. Seawell, Jr., and we call him "Chub." Chub has often said that while he neither drinks nor smokes, he is bound to acknowledge that he has never known of anybody smoking a package of cigarettes and driving home on the wrong side of the road and beating his wife.

Chub Seawell is totally against alcohol consumption, and he does not smoke. But his position underscores what the Senator from South Carolina, with the cosponsorship of the Senator from North Carolina, is trying to accomplish, and that is fairness and equity. I would prefer, of course, there to be no increase in the cigarette tax. But if there is to be an increase let it be accompanied by a fair and equitable tax increase on another commodity; namely, distilled spirits. Let us be fair, let us exercise a modicum of commonsense. I thank the Senator for yielding time.

Mr. THURMOND. I am very pleased to have the distinguished Senator from North Carolina to join as cosponsor of this amendment. Also the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) joined as cosponsor, and he desired to make a few remarks.

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be pleased to yield to the able Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. We are talking about fairness here, and I think the distinguished Senator from North Carolina is talking about fairness in applying the tax equally among two products. What tax is placed on beer in the Senator's amendment?

Mr. THURMOND. None on beer, just distilled liquor.

Mr. FORD. Is there any tax on wine?

Mt. THURMOND. None on wine. Beer and wine are the drinks of the poor people, but distilled liquors are the drinks of the rich people.

Mr. FORD. I did not know that. But I am just asking here, is beer for the rich of for the poor?

Mr. THURMOND. I think I answered the Senator's question.

Mr. FORD. I just asked the Senator the question. All I am trying to find out is what this amendment covers.

Mr. THURMOND. This amendment simply does this: Instead of putting an 8-cent increase on cigarettes, it puts a 4-cent increase. And then it puts sufficient tax on alcoholic beverages to offset that so that the revenue will not be reduced under this bill. It just divides the revenue to be raised under this bill by increasing the cigarette tax; instead of 100 percent, increase it 50 percent and then put the rest of the increase on alcoholic beverages. We think that is fair. We think it is just.

The tax on alcoholic beverages has not been increased since the cigarette tax was increased and this just divides it between the two.

Now somebody says that cigarettes cause cancer. Well, that is a matter to be gone into. But alcohol causes more diseases, more heart trouble, more kidney trouble, and more liver trouble. Research shows that pregnant mothers are damaged more by alcohol than any other one thing. And alcohol has caused wrecks in automobiles; it has caused drunken driving; it has killed people; it has done more harm to humanity than any other one thing I can think of. I see no harm in letting alcohol bear a share of this tax increase along with cigarettes. That is all we are asking. I hope the manager of this bill would accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator from South Carolina yielding.

Mr. President, let me comment briefly on the arguments made in favor of this amendment. They were made in the Finance Committee with regard to the health issue and at that point I made the argument that there probably is little question in the minds of the American people that both the consumption of cigarettes and liquor can and do cause health problems in this country. The question is who has some responsibility for picking up the tab. Obviously, the first responsibility is on the consumer himself or herself. It also falls on private insurers in this country and it falls on State and local governments and the Federal Government.

I fight the theory that we ought to increase these taxes simply because they create health problems and, therefore, through medicare or medicaid or some other form of Federal program we ought to eliminate these problems. The greatest bulk of Government responsibility for health care in this country falls on State and local governments.

That leads me into just a brief comment about this particular amendment, which would raise taxes by 4 cents on cigarettes at the Federal level and an equivalent amount of dollars on liquor.

I, frankly, think it is inappropriate. I think we act like State legislators when we sit around here trying to find the easiest thing to tax in order to raise money. The President of the United States, despite how I may have allegedly characterized the premise of his New Federalism initiatives last week, recommended to us sometime back that cigarette taxes, liquor taxes, and telephone taxes are the one form of taxation that belongs to State and local governments, and we ought to get out of that business and send it all back to State and local governments.

I supported that premise in the Finance Committee, and I will support that premise here on the floor of the U.S. Senate. I will support his New Federalism initiative, and I will support taking this kind of tax out of the Federal level, taking it out of this bill and sending it back to the State and local governments.

So, therefore, while I found myself on Senator THURMOND's side on the other issue, I regrettably find myself opposed to him on this issue.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise to join my distinguished colleague from South Carolina in supporting this amendment. Clearly, this tax on tobacco is targeted against 55 million Americans who voluntarily exercise their own free will and have elected to use tobacco in one way or another.

I do not see why we, as a body, should elect to put this regressive type of tax on those Americans who, of their own free will, utilize tobacco, and particularly when the tax will fall most heavily on those in the lower income brackets who can least afford to bear this burden.

Additionally, the tax is harmful to the States. And that has been clearly documented here throughout this morning's discussion.

In view of that, it seems that the principal motivation being to legislate against one type of luxury, both luxuries, liquor and tobacco, should equally bear this tax.

It is for that reason that I join my distinguished colleague from South Carolina and others in urging the Senate to bring some equality to this taxing system if, in fact, we are going to single out certain categories of Americans to bear this tax.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I know of no request for time on this side. I would just say briefly that this matter was considered. I can understand the concern of those coming from tobacco States. It occurred to us in our discussions that distilled spirits are taxed at a rather high level, $10.50 per proof gallon, and wine is not taxed heavily at all.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr GOLDWATER. Can the Senator give us any idea of how much this might raise in the way of taxes?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; the Thurmond amendment would increase the tax on distilled spirits by $3.30 to $13.80 per proof gallon.

It would raise $940 million in 1983, $940 million in 1984, $944 million in 1985. Against that you offset the 4 cents reduction in the cigarette tax. The amendment would cut the 8 cents increase in the cigarette tax in half and that would reduce the revenue there. But he would end up with a total of about $5.5 billion. That is over 3 years.

Mr. GOLDWATER. There would be that many people paying?

Mr. DOLE. Well, yes. As the Senator from North Carolina pointed out, at least when you smoke, you do not end up on the wrong side of the road. When you are smoking straight cigarettes, that is not a problem.

In any event, we discussed this at some length among the Republican Members in our caucus. They are all nonsmokers. I do not know whether that had anything to do with the suggestion. It was determined not to increase the tax on distilled spirits.

I would be happy to yield back my time. The amendment is not germane. I will make a point of order that the amendment is not germane. The Senator from South Carolina can get a vote, of course, by appealing the ruling of the Chair. I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. THURMOND. Does the Senator feel that the drinkers should share the same proportion here as the smokers?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. THURMOND. Then I assume the Senator would support this amendment.

Mr. DOLE. I do not know how you figure this. If you do not smoke or drink, you do not have any real problem. If you smoke and do not drink, then you have mixed feelings. If you smoke and drink, you not only have this problem but you have other problems. It just occurred to us that liquor was getting hit pretty hard anyway. It is pretty stiff. We decided not to increase that. I would be happy to yield back my time.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina contains a new subject matter not contained in the bill nor in any of the amendments reported by the Finance Committee. So, for that reason, it is nongermane. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I can understand why the Chair would sustain that as a technical matter. However, as a practical matter, as a fair and reasonable matter, this motion should not be sustained because it is a tax, a tax on cigarettes and a tax on liquor. It should be possible to shift this some. That is what we are trying to do. For that reason, I will appeal the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator is not satisfied with the results, it would be much more appropriate for the Senator to move for a waiver rather than to ask us to vote to overrule the Chair, when the Chair is clearly doing its duty. He could achieve the same result by a motion to waive. There is a provision in the Budget Act for the Senator to move for a waiver.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest——

Mr. LONG. The motion would be to waive the germaneness requirement of the Budget Act so that the amendment could be considered. Then the Senator would not be asking us to overrule the Chair when the Chair is doing its duty.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, that is entirely satisfactory. I will ask for a waiver. I ask unanimous consent for a waiver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order, unless the Senator from Kansas withdraws the point of order.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Kansas will withdraw. I want to be fair to the Senator from South Carolina. I know this is very important to him. I am just thinking out loud here. Maybe there would not be any objection to not raising a question of germaneness and not requiring a waiver but just voting on the amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. That would be fine.

Mr. DOLE. Would anybody object to that?

Mr. FORD. I would hope the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee would not make that judgment yet. If it is not germane to the legislation, and he indicates that it is not, it seems to me that the order should lie and that we ought to sustain what the Budget Committee is doing and what the Finance Committee is doing. It seems to me if you do not challenge it when you say it is not germane, then you have diluted the authority and violated the intent of the Finance Committee. Maybe I have some selfish motive. The State I represent will get hurt both ways here. I understand what the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from North Carolina are doing. They are sticking the cigarette industry with 4 cents and the distilled spirits industry with $3.50. While it is already paying $10.50 a proof/gallon.

Somewhere along the way the integrity of the Finance Committee will have to be sustained.

Mr. THURMOND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. I do not have the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Eight cents for cigarettes and $10 for a gallon of liquor. A pack of cigarettes cannot be compared to a gallon of liquor.

Mr. FORD. I am not arguing that point right now. I am arguing the integrity of the Finance Committee. If it is nongermane, it is nongermane. Let the Senate override it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my birthday and I want to get along with everyone today. We did, on an amendment yesterday by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), a big amendment on the third year, waive the germaneness requirement because that was a matter that the Democratic Policy Group wanted very much.

I support the Senator from Kentucky. I am going to vote against the amendment, and I guess most everyone else will—well, I do not know that. A lot of people will vote against it. I want to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina so we can get some kind of a vote.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it seems to me that all the Senator has to do is to move to waive the provisions of the Budget Act under section 904 of that act, so that the amendment might be considered and we can vote on that waiver. A vote on that is similar to a vote on the merits of the amendment. Those opposed to the amendment can vote against the waiver.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for a waiver.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under these circumstances, the point of order having been ruled on, it is not timely to make a motion to waive the section of the Budget Act. The point of order would have to be withdrawn.

Mr. DOLE. It would take unanimous consent to withdraw the point of order. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I appeal the ruling of the Chair. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the Budget Act there is 1 hour of debate on the appeal. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

Mr. THURMOND. I yield back my time.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, What is the question before the body?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the body is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is nongermane?

Mr. FORD. What will be the vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A yea vote sustains the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. FORD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we want to overrule the Chair so we can vote on my amendment. That is all we are asking. This does not go into the merits. We want to go into the merits and get a vote. That would save time, but the Senator from Arizona objected, so it is taking more time.

Mr. DOLE. A yea vote sustains the Chair, Is that correct, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back——

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object at this time. Let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EAST). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 79, nays 18, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Hollings Inouye Metzenbaum

So, the ruling of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. KASTEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1113

(Purpose: To alter the increase in the excise tax on cigarettes)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be in order to consider the amendment at this time.

The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1113.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 445, strike out lines 7 through 12 and insert in lieu thereof:

(a) RATE OF TAX.—Subsection (b) of section 5701 (relating to rate of tax on cigarettes) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) CIGARETTES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—On cigarettes, manufactured in or imported into the United States, there shall be imposed a tax at the applicable rate.

"(2) APPLICABLE RATE.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'applicable rate' means—

"(A) with respect to cigarettes weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand which are removed—

"(i) after December 31, 1982 and before October 1, 1985, $8, and

"(ii) after September 30, 1985, $2;

"(B) with respect to cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand which are removed—

"(i) after December 31, 1982 and before October 1, 1985, $16.80, and

"(ii) after September 30, 1985, $4.20; and

"(C) with respect to cigarettes more than 6½ inches in length, the rate specified by subparagraph (A), counting each 2¾ inches, or fraction thereof, of the length of each as one cigarette.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Senate will be in order, so that the Senator from North Carolina can proceed.

Mr. HELMS. I am grateful to the Chair.

Mr. President, obviously we are at somewhat of an impasse, but I believe I have a suggestion. While it may not be totally acceptable to everybody, it may be a reasonable compromise. Let us give it a whirl.

Mr. President, the pending amendment provides that the tax on cigarettes—which has been increased by this measure to 16 cents per package, doubled from 8 cents per package—be "sunsetted" on September 30, 1985, and that the tax be reduced at that time from 16 to 4 cents. Remember, the tax is being doubled by this bill, from 8 to 16 cents.

This would permit the revenues, which the Senate has just voted, to be secured from cigarettes, to be met in the full amount as long as needed to meet this budget resolution. At the same time we would not exceed that amount in what is referred to in the parlance of the Budget Act as the outyears.

Mr. President, I do not like my own amendment, but I am doing the best I can to salvage a situation which at present is obviously untenable. I hope this amendment will meet with the approval of the managers of the bill. Although I feel very strongly that tobacco consumers already provide more than their fair share of tax revenues, this amendment would lessen the impact of the additional increase imposed by this bill later on.

It is only reasonable that we do not impose this punitive tax indefinitely, but rather ask that the additional burden only be borne until the revenues required by this legislation are raised.

My amendment seeks a measure of equity by limiting the hardship caused by this tax. Its regressive nature will place a far greater proportional burden on low income tobacco consumers than others who smoke. Also, this tax increase will severely restrict State and local governments in their ability to raise needed revenues.

The imposition of this tax for a definite length of time rather than the language contained in H.R. 4961, will at least provide for future relief for tobacco consumers and the 276,000 farm families who will be required to bear an inordinate share of the tax burden of this bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we have had a lot of debate here about unfair provisions of this package and, in one of the proposals presented yesterday by Senator BRADLEY, there was a proposal to eliminate the 8 cents a pack increase on cigarettes. There was also a provision to eliminate the telephone tax.

The Senator from Kansas believes probably the only criticism we have had—and we have had a lot of criticism—but I think the point has been made that what we are in effect doing is in taxing the little people, the people who smoke, or who use the telephone, or people who fly around in an airplane.

The Senator from Kansas sent a memo to both Senators from Kentucky and both Senators from North Carolina about 3 or 4 weeks ago saying, "Do not be surprised if there is not an effort made to increase the tax on cigarettes."

That did occur.

The Senator from Kansas said last evening I can understand the distress and concern of Senators from tobacco producing States. It was my hope we might be able to have enough cushion in the bill to maybe lower that additional 8 cents to some lower figure, maybe 6 cents, maybe 5 cents, maybe even 7 cents. But I am advised for every cent that it is lowered we are talking about $230 million.

I am also advised by the joint committee that we do not have any cushion in the bill, that we are probably, at most, $100 million over the $98.3 billion that we were mandated to raise by the budget resolution.

So I suggest to the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina that we might do this, that we might sunset the so-called additional 8 cents on October 1, 1985. That does not impact on the numbers in our resolution and in the Finance Committee package.

Then in an effort to offset some of the criticism and some of the distress in the tobacco industry, to make up for that, we would lower the tax after that time to 4 cents a package so that we would have some offset to take care of the increase that we are placing on the tobacco industry, not on the industry as such, but the people who smoke cigarettes.

It was my hope that this might respond to the charge that we are being unfair, we are picking on working men and women who happen to smoke and others who happen to smoke for $5 billion of revenue in a $98.3 billion package.

The Senator from North Carolina has indicated an interest in that proposal. In fact, that is the amendment before the Senate now.

It would be my hope that we could adopt this provision. Again I think it is fair. If we have been unfair, perhaps it is in this area. This would take some time to undo that unfairness, but it could happen and would happen. It would also make certain that the unfairness did not continue beyond 1985.

I hope that there might be support for this provision.

The Senator from Kansas is willing to accept the provision, although unless there are some who might insist on a rollcall vote.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, first let me say that I have looked with the greatest of admiration at the work that has been done by the chairman of our committee in connection with this bill, both in the Chamber, and in the work of the Finance Committee.

To consider the fact that I think 8 days elapsed from when the Senate passed the budget resolution to the time when the Finance Committee completed its work, I think is testimony to really the fine work and the cooperation of the committee, but especially to the leadership of Senator DOLE. It is a remarkably difficult undertaking that he has embarked upon, and it may prove before the day is out to be an impossible undertaking to keep this package together.

I understand what the chairman of the Finance Committee is doing in trying to work out something that is reasonably acceptable to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, and I appreciate that.

For that reason, I will not insist on a rollcall vote. I will vote against this amendment. I will not insist on a rollcall vote. I do not know wehether someone else will or not.

But let me just say this: As I recollect the facts, and I may be mistaken, and if I am, I hope that I will be corrected, but I think the last time that the cigarette tax was increased was something like 1966 and in 1966 it was set at 8 cents a pack.

Since that time, if we were simply to adjust the cigarette tax for inflation, if we were simply to index the cigarette tax for the rate of inflation, the cigarette tax today would now be not 8 cents a pack or 16 cents a pack, it would be something like 23 cents or 24 cents a pack in terms of the value of the tax when it was imposed some 15 years ago or so.

What we have done in the Finance Committee is said, "Well, let us raise it 8 cents a pack, not the full amount of inflation, but let us raise it just 8 cents a pack," and we are told. "Oh, that is outrageous, it is just terrible to expect people who smoke to pay an additional 8 cents a pack."

Eight cents a pack would mean that a pack-a-day smoker would only pay 8 cents a day to help the budget of this country, and it is as though that is an unbearable burden on people who smoke a pack a day.

Mr. President, if we were to take a poll of smokers and ask them whether they believe that they were being hurt, crushed, taken advantage of by paying 8 cents a day to help the economy of this country, I wonder what the answer would be.

But we are so hypersensitive to imagined criticism, of which I have heard none, that we rush to say, "Oh, no, we do not want to hurt you."

The result of this amendment would be that after 3 years is up the cigarette tax which for the last 15 years has been 8 cents a pack would be reduced from 8 cents to 4 cents. It would be cut in half.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. In just 1 minute.

Now, Mr. President, this reduction, proposed reduction, in the cigarette tax would take place against the following background: First of all, in recent times, the last what, 20 years or so, the Surgeon General has found, I think conclusively, well-accepted in medical circles, various health defects caused by smoking. That is not a matter of serious debate except perhaps on the part of the paid representatives of the tobacco companies.

The second thing that has occurred is that the Federal Government has been stuck with the bill. The Federal Government pays the cost of smoking. The taxpayers of this country, as a whole, whether they smoke or whether they do not smoke, pay the cost of smoking. How do they do this? Medicare, medicaid, disability insurance, all paid by the public for the cost of smoking and, as a matter of fact, a few years ago when I introduced a bill to increase the cigarette tax by a dime a pack, the research that I did at that time indicated that a dime a pack would pick up something like $3 billion a year, and that the cost to the public caused by cigarette smoking through medicaid and medicare and disability insurance amounted to about the same amount of money, $3 billion.

So 8 cents a pack does not even recoup the cost to the public caused by smoking. That is our subsidy in health care for smokers.

What we are doing in this amendment, because we say, "Oh, it is just crushing people to pay 8 cents a day, just crushing them, wiping them out. Eight cents a day, who can afford that?" we are saying, "We are going to make good for you after 3 years. We are going to reduce the cigarette tax, reduce it by 4 cents."

Mr. President, for that reason I am constrained to vote against this amendment because I think it is absolutely outrageous. But in cooperation with the Senator from Kansas I will not ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Can the Senator imagine any policy reason for reducing the cigarette tax?

Mr. DANFORTH. No.

Mr. BRADLEY. I can understand a reason for increasing it at this particular time in our economic condition, but what is the rationale, the substantive justification, for reducing the cigarette tax?

Mr. DANFORTH. I can imagine absolutely no justification, and I cannot imagine any justification for not increasing it. I cannot imagine that 8 cents a pack—8 cents, what is 8 cents? You cannot, unfortunately, today park a car for 8 cents. You cannot feed a meter in very many towns, you cannot put a dime in a meter, even a dime in a meter, and park your car for 12 minutes or whatever. You cannot even do that any more. Eight cents a pack and that is what we have been debating amendments, appeals to the Chair.

Mr. BRADLEY. Would the Senator know how much revenue would be lost if it were reduced to 4 cents from 8 cents?

Mr. DANFORTH. I do not have the figure with me, but I am sure the chairman has it.

Mr. BRADLEY. But revenue would be lost?

Mr. DANFORTH. Pardon?

Mr. BRADLEY. Revenue would be lost?

Mr. DANFORTH. Of course revenue would be lost.

Mr. BRADLEY. That means if revenue is lost, receipts would be less. potentially this increases the deficit, is that not correct?

Mr. DANFORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. In 1985

Mr. DANFORTH. Right.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Whoever has time——

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thought yesterday I was criticized by the Senator from New Jersey for increasing the tax on cigarettes. Today I am being criticized because we are trying to equalize it.

I will be happy to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator explain how that is equalizing if you reduce the tax by half?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator wanted to double the tax.

Mr. BRADLEY. I did not want to double the tax. I did not think at this time in our economic circumstances——

Mr. DOLE. The Senator did not want to increase the tax.

Mr. BRADLEY [continuing]. We should increase the tax. But that does not mean I want to cut the tax in half.

Mr. DOLE. I thought I heard yesterday that these taxes were regressive, they were against the little people. I read that in the paper that the Republicans are going after the little people, the people who smoke and use the telephones. If you do both, you really have got a problem. But I am just trying to be fair because I thought the Senator said I was trying to be unfair.

Mr. BRADLEY. I think the question of fairness applies to what happens the next year and the year after and the year after that. I do not see what the justification is for cutting the cigarette tax that has been at the present level for how long, 20 years, cutting it in half, unless it is to bring people along who support it at another point on another amendment, and I can understand that. But I think we ought to be clear about what this amendment is. It is not about any substantive reason. It has nothing to do with the closing of the deficit. It is a way in the next 3 or 4 years, after which you try to make up the damage that you have done already in the next 2 years by raising the tax. If you did not raise the tax, you would not have to lower it 3 years from now.

Mr. DOLE. That is good thinking, and I agree with that. We could limit the reduction for 3 years, and everybody would be equal if they smoke and live that long. Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. BRADLEY. To what level?

Mr. DOLE. Well, you keep it at 4 cents for 3 years, and then you are all even after six years.

Mr. BRADLEY. Is that part of this amendment, after 6 years it goes back up?

Mr. DOLE. We could modify it if that would satisfy the Senator.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think by the time 1985 rolls around economic conditions may be different and Congress will consider all tax proposals in all probability at that time.

I would just like to respond very briefly to this matter of the tax income and try to point out the fallacy of the proposition suggested by the distinguished Senator from Missouri that the 8-cent increase is an insignificant figure.

We are not talking about just an 8-cent increase in all reality, and if you look at the tax revenue from cigarettes I think it is appropriate to look at it not only from the Federal perspective but also from the State and city and other local jurisdictions' perspective.

I would like to submit some figures that have been developed, not by a tobacco farmer but by Dr. Milton Shuffett, who is a professor of agricultural economics at the University of Kentucky.

These figures are based on the compilation by Dr. Shuffett of a number of dissertations and research done by other experts in the field. The proposition he makes is if an 8-cent increase is imposed upon the cigarette tax, that State tax collections would decline by $343 million a year; local excise taxes would decline by $12 million a year; and State sales taxes would decline by $89 million. These are substantial figures for State and local jurisdictions now being called upon to assume more of the burden for various programs that previously had been supported by the Federal Treasury.

Also in the compilations is the fact that just in the burley tobacco area—and burley is not as large as the Fluecured tobacco area, and of course, there are other tobacco classifications also—but an 8-cent increase would result in the loss of income on the farm of $64 million per year. Now that, of course, means a loss of additional income tax and other taxes there from farmers.

So there is a considerable amount of attention that ought to be given, in my judgment, to the total impact of this. As has been pointed out many times, while the Federal tax has not been increased since 1951, State and local taxes have increased tremendously, some 350 percent.

So I think if it is the determination of this Senate, and by the indications of the previous vote it must be the determination, that there will be an increase in the cigarette tax, then it is logical—to meet the specific problems that the country is confronted with at the present time—it seems to me it is fair and equitable to put some concluding date on that, and it is fair and equitable to think of then reducing that tax to something like the level that is more appropriate, and the question of whether or not that means substantial loss of income revenue is one that can be debated I think by Congress for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ARMSTRONG). The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to yield myself some time in opposition.

Let me say that I voted with our friends from the tobacco-producing States against the cigarette tax, and I opposed increasing it. But by the same token, I am opposed to cutting the cigarette tax. I do not think we are justified in reducing the tax while we are raising the tax on everything else, and so I am going to vote against the amendment and, Mr. President, I have about decided to ask for the yeas and nays on this matter. But I would like to dispose of the amendment because there are other people who want to offer their amendments.

We have voted two times on the cigarette tax and this will be the third time we will vote on this matter. I say respectfully to my friends from the producing States that they do not have the votes, and we might as well go to on to something else. In order to save some time, I hope the Senator will settle for 5 minutes because I would like to vote on this. I yield the Senator 5 minutes.

Mr. EAGLETON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I was sitting here minding my own business awaiting the calling up of my amendment, which is next in line. My amendment deals with the telephone tax. But then, while, frankly, napping a little I started to focus on this amendment now before us.

Mr. President, I am appalled, I am mortified, I am stunned at the brazenness of this amendment. It cannot be offered in all sincerity and good faith.

Let us understand what the amendment is. The present tax on cigarettes is 8 cents. According to page 390 of the report, that has been tax since 1951; for 31 years it has been at 8 cents.

The bill, in order to bring in much-needed revenue, ups it to 16 cents. Then, in 1985, if this amendment were to prevail, it would drop to 4 cents. Thus, come 1985 the cigarette tax would be half of what it is today.

Now, we have just heard from my dear friend from Kentucky that this is the right thing to do because, in 1985, we want to take a retrospective look at what this tax has been doing to the tobacco industry. I wish he would have said those same words in the debate a week or so ago when I tried to have a sunset provision on the basic tobacco price support program. I said, a week ago with respect to the basic tobacco price support program, "Let's take a look at it in 1985." He said, "No." The Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, said, "dangerous," the Senator from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, said, "unthinkable."

What was "unthinkable" and "dangerous" last week in terms of taking a look at the tobacco program, today, with respect to the tax, is conventional wisdom according to the tobacco State Senators. Can we be so foolish?

Thank God there are people in the gallery. This kind of an amendment usually comes in at 1 o'clock in the morning in the dead of night. [Laughter.] But fortunately we now have the fine light of day to focus on this. Everybody is dancing gingerly around here on this amendment. Nobody wants to ask for the yeas and nays on this "hot potato." Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is not a sufficient second.

The Chair will put the question again. Is there a sufficient second? There is now a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will take just a minute. I was trying to find the statement from yesterday of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey with reference to the cigarette tax. But I would point out that yestersay on the vote on reducing the cigarette tax from 16 cents to 8 cents, 45 Members of the Senate voted to do that. That was coupled with other provisions.

Again, I want to make certain that we are clearly understood because if I was unfair yesterday in increasing the tax and unfair today in trying to lower the tax, then I am not certain just where you end up. But it seems to me that this is a fair and equitable amendment.

The telephone tax is another one that we have had on the books for a long time. It was a temporary tax, started, I guess, in World War II. It has gone as high as 10 cents, down to 1 cent. The Senator from Kansas does not have any idea what we will find will happen to the cigarette tax.

In any event, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the vote on yesterday to lower the tax from 16 cents to 8 cents.

There being no objection, the vote was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 234 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—1

Inouye.

So the amendment (No. 1978), as modified, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished manager of the bill. He has been both fair and equitable through the consideration of this piece of legislation.

THE FEDERAL CIGARETTE TAX INCREASE SHOULD BE REJECTED

Raising the Federal excise tax (FET) on cigarettes is an unfair and unfortunate attempt to solve the Nation's severe deficit problem at the expense of one class of citizens—55 million adult Americans who happen to smoke tobacco.

In general, excise tax increases have not been a highly regarded therapy to cure economic ills such as persistently high interest rates and unbalanced budgets. Raising taxes makes even less sense in a recession.

The President rejected this approach in his State of the Union message:

Higher taxes would not mean lower deficits . . . Raising taxes won't balance the budget . . . Raising taxes will slow economic growth, reduce production, and destroy future jobs . . . I will seek no tax increases this year.

Democrats on the Joint Economic Committee also rejected excise tax hikes:

We oppose regressive increases in Federal excise taxes solely to balance the budget. Such excise tax increases are inflationary and unfair in their incidence . . . Increases in Federal excise taxes, especially in the 'sin taxes' on alcohol and tobacco, are a superficially attractive means of raising new Federal revenues. This temptation should be avoided.

CIGARETTE TAXES HAVE GONE UP AND UP

The FET increase is often justified by the argument that the present rate has not increased since 1951. This argument overlooks two important facts.

FET collections have nearly doubled from $1.3 billion to $2.5 billion a year.

State excise tax rates on cigarettes have jumped from 3 cents to 13.4 cents, almost 350 percent. State tax revenues on cigarettes, including sales tax, shot up from $466 million in 1951 to nearly $4.4 billion in 1981, a rise of more than 800 percent.

THE TOBACCO TAX BURDEN IS HEAVY

The customers of the tobacco industry already bear a heavy tax burden. They paid out—

More than $7 billion a year in excise and sales taxes to all levels of government in 1981.

The Federal Government collected $2.488 billion, the States collected $4.390 billion, while cities and counties collected $163.9 million.

More than $343.5 billion since 1921, the first year a State cigarette excise tax went into effect.

The Federal share was $218.8 billion and the States' share was $124.7 billion—all expressed in 1981 dollars.

The Federal cigarette excise tax is among the highest imposed on any product in the United States—6½ times higher than the Federal tax on wine, 3.7 times the tax on gasoline, 1.8 to 3.7 times of the tax on tires, 2.2 times the tax on airline tickets, and 1.6 times the tax on beer.

SO IS THE BURDEN OF OTHER TAXES

The tobacco industry and all its supporting sectors contribute a substantial amount in other tax revenue to Federal and State governments—an additional $13.6 billion a year based on a 1979 Wharton economic study.

A FEDERAL TAX HIKE HURTS THE STATES

States have become more and more dependent on cigarette excise taxes to finance programs and services for all citizens. Yet one class of taxpayers—cigarette smokers—are more heavily burdened to help pay for them. Increasing the Federal excise tax on cigarettes will threaten present and future State revenues from tobacco sales.

Cigarette taxes are six times more important as a source of revenues for the States than for the Federal Government.

State cigarette taxes have been increased 224 times, at an average rate of 5 percent a year since 1951.

Local governments have been active too: 369 cities and counties also tax cigarettes, some as high as 15 cents a pack over and above Federal and State excise levies—for a total of nearly $164 million last year.

Consequenty, State legislators oppose Federal preemption of their tax territory. In a letter to the Senate Finance Committee they said:

The National Conference of State Legislators wishes to express our concern over the impact of these items on the ability of states to raise revenues from their own sources and finance debt in order to provide adequate levels of services to our mutual constituents. Several items recently published are of immediate concern in the area of preempting state ability to raise tax revenues from traditionally state and local tax sources. Most directly affecting this ability would be substantial increases in excise taxes for cigarettes, alcohol, telephone service, and any increase in the energy consumption taxes.

EXCISE TAXES ARE HIGHLY REGRESSIVE

The proposal to raise the FET imposes a greater tax burden on the poor than on the affluent. For many people in the lower income brackets, the cigarette tax increase would severely cut into the few extra dollars from the personal income tax cut.

A single person who smokes the national average of 1.5 packs a day earning a take home pay of $100 a week, gets a tax break of $22.88 while the FET increase is $43.80. At a $200-a-week take home, over one-third of the $129 tax break goes to pay the cigarette tax increase.

A married smoker with four exemptions and a take home pay of $141.45 gets a $28 tax break and a $43.80 cigarette tax increase. At $214.94 a week, the tax break is about a dollar less than the cigarette tax rise.

Economic studies have found that—

Federal cigarette taxes are extremely regressive: the lower income smoker spends a five-time-greater share of his income than a high-income smoker who smokes the same amount of cigarettes.

State and local cigarette taxes are similarly regressive and unfair to lower income consumers.

Since the percentage of income spent on tobacco falls as income rises, cigarette excise taxes are levied at a higher effective rate on the poor than on the rich. Persons living on fixed incomes are especially vulnerable to the inflationary effect of regressive taxes.

For every dollar of retail sales, government tax collectors—Federal, State, and local—skim off 33 cents. Without these taxes, the agerage price of a pack of cigarettes could drop to 48.5 cents, the basic cost.

An 8-cent FET hike would raise the tax burden to 66 percent of the basis cost of a pack of cigarettes, raising the average retail price from 72 cents to at least 80 cents, and possibly more.

NEGATIVE IMPACTS AHEAD

Raising the cigarette excise tax will create an additional major problem—a negative impact on the earnings and cost of many businesses that support the basis segments of the cigarette industry. Moreover, these negative effects will render the Federal excise tax an inefficient and costly method of raising revenue, because of the trade-off between tax revenue gains and business income or productivity losses.

As the AFL–CIO Food and Beverage Department put it to the Finance Committee:

> In a period when this country is experiencing post war highs in unemployment, revenue raising alternatives which will assuredly promote further declines in employment cannot be tolerated. An increase in the level of excise taxes imposed on distilled spirits or tobacco products would precipitate decreased consumption, forcing many small manufacturing, wholesaling and retailing firms in these markets out of business. Further employee layoffs would be the natural consequences.

Raising taxes before an election is risky business politically. Raising taxes during a recession is even riskier economically. Clearly, raising excise taxes on consumer products will not stimulate consumer spending and help move the economy forward.

It seems unwise to attempt to raise excise taxes that cannot come close to bridging the deficit gap—and that could even fall short of the projected increases. Because of the negative economic impacts, and less-than-inelastic demand the revenue collected will not be proportionate to the rate increase.

Doubling the cigarette tax rate will not double the cigarette tax collection—but will threaten jobs, earnings, productivity, and economic growth of the tobacco industry and its supporting industries.

TO SUM UP

The proposal to increase the Federal cigarette tax has problems and strong opposition for several reasons.

It is unfair to 55 million Americans who are targeted for higher taxes than other citizens simply because they happen to smoke cigarettes.

It is a regressive tax which falls most heavily on those in the lower income brackets who can least afford to bear the burden.

It is harmfully competitive to States, preempting their ability to raise revenues.

It is an efficient and costly taxing mechanism that will produce less-than-expected net revenues and significant negative economic effects.

The proposed Federal cigarette tax increase should be rejected.

Mr. FORD. Will the distinguished Senator from Louisiana yield me 1 minute,

Mr. LONG. I yield 1 minute to the Senator.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, let me say two things. When you increase the tax 8 cents, you have increased it more than that in vending machines. Second, the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) said that 8 cents was not enough money to take care of a parking meter. I would invite him to come Owensboro, Ky. We just took a hacksaw and cut all of the parking meters out and he may park free in our town and spend his money.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I would say to my friend from Kentucky that I sometimes feel an inclination to buy the Senator from Missouri a one-way ticket to Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORD. As long as we do not get both of them.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 27 minutes remaining.

Mr. HELMS. I can assure the Chair I do not intend to use nearly that much.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum on my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, these rhetorical exercises on tobacco have an astounding effect on some Members of the Senate. I am glad we make them feel better as they stand forthrightly and courageously for motherhood and against sin, they can get a few headlines back home by also being against tobacco. I am delighted that they have again had the opportunity to make some headlines back home. I suppose it would be beside the point to express the hope that one day they might give some thought to the 276,000 small farm operators who are struggling to make a living by growing a legitimate crop—tobacco.

I am going to test and see what good faith is.

I send an unprinted amendment to the desk as a substitute to the pending amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the Senator that the amendment which he sent to the desk is not in order until the time for the now pending amendment has expired. The substitute would be a third-degree amendment and would then be in order.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator be satisfied if we give consent for him to modify his amendment?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator be permitted to modify his amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the modification is.

Mr. LONG. The modification would be that the tax increase would be in effect for 3 years, but after that there would be no cut in the tax below the present rate. In other words, the tax would increase to 16 cents for 3 years and then it would go back to 8 cents.

Mr. BRADLEY. So that he is withdrawing the amendment that would cut the taxes 4 cents?

Mr. LONG. He would modify his amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have no objection to the modification. The issue is not that you are against tobacco but it is greed, in reducing the 4 cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from North Carolina be permitted to modify his amendment? Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment is so modified.

The modification follows:

On page 447, at line 25, after "December 31, 1982", insert the following: "and before September 30, 1985".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise Senators that the Chair is unable to hear them.

Who seeks recognition?

Mr. DOLE. I wonder if there is some agreement that we can dispose of this without the yeas and nays.

Mr. EAGLETON. I would like about 4 minutes to speak on it and then I will ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) and myself would like to be noted as cosponsors to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I believe I have control of the time in opposition to the amendment. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the Senator from Louisiana that he does not have control of the time on the amendment but he can yield time on the bill.

Mr. LONG. Who has time in opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. I yield 5 minutes.

Mr. EAGLETON. As the Senator from New Jersey pointed out, the amendment has now been modified from the level of outright greed and now it is at the level of petty thievery. Before, in its previous posture, it was equivalent to the Brink's Robbery. In the present posture, it is equivalent to stealing a bottle of wine from Queen Elizabeth.

What I said with respect to the earlier amendment applies almost with the same vigor and intensity on this modified version.

We were told that a "package" had been reported out of the Senate Finance Committee and the "package" was a tightly integrated "package." Each piece of the "package" depended for its survivability on the other pieces of the "package." It had to be taken as a whole. Thus, for 2 or 3 days, however long we have been considering the bill, various amendments have been beaten off because, it is argued, such and such amendment would destroy the integrated nature of the "package."

Now we are told that we have hit cigarettes too hard and, come 1985, the cigarette tax will be sunsetted back to the current level of 8 cents per package.

In my judgment, the 8 cent increase that is in this bill was not heavy enough. We should have gone higher. Thus, to sunset this tax increase in 1985 would be a grievous mistake.

Senator Helms has made the amendment somewhat more palatable than it was in its previous incarnation, but even in its present form, this is a totally inappropriate and unwise amendment. I hope my colleagues will reject it.

Mr. EAST. Will the Senator yield me a very brief period of time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 3 minutes.

Mr. EAST. I appreciate the Senator yielding to me these several minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. EAST. First, the point we have been making on increasing this tax on cigarettes is that States since 1951 have increased the tax 350 percent. That is an enormous tax burden. Now we are going to double the Federal tax. So we are saying at some point in time that this becomes counterproductive, punitive, and diminishes as a revenue source.

Second, I would note it is contrary to the New Federalism idea in that the States have been relying heavily upon this tax and now we are going to intrude the Federal Government further into it. I think that is a mistake.

Finally, Madam President, I find it ironical in this very emotional debate, and I understand it is very critical and is an emotional issue, that the two leading proponents in the Senate today on this very important question of a cigarette tax should represent a State that is the greatest brewery State in the United States. I suspect if we were here debating whether we ought to double the Federal tax on a can of beer, we would find a different posture.

We see the distinguished Senator from Missouri, representing a State that is one of the great centers of beer production in the United States, in here agitating on and on over the health issue. There are limits to this. If cigarettes are not healthy if used in abuse, I raise the question of alcohol used in excess, whether that does not present a major health question.

What is good for the goose is good for the gander. I would not be surprised to see us in 6 months, a year or two, in here debating whether it might not be prudent to double, triple, and quadruple the tax on beer in this country on the theory that the first drink of beer then leads to whiskey and on it goes and we have a country where alcoholism is a major problem. The number of deaths from driving caused by people who have been drinking is enormous. The greatest cause of death of young people between the ages of 18 and 25 is from drunken driving, and it comes principally from beer consumption.

I am not trying to launch a vendetta against the beer industry, but I will tell you one thing: From time to time I am tempted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. EAST. Having made my point, I shall cease, Madam President, but let us not raise this thing beyond——

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the Senator such additional time as he might require.

Mr. EAST. I appreciate the Senator doing that.

I am trying to put this in perspective, not trying to get into a great emotional debate. Since the issue has been raised, and raised repeatedly, against those of us who represent the tobacco-producing States, I would simply remind my colleagues we are not the only State that produces a commodity that, used in excess, might be harmful to health.

Again, it cannot be lost—the irony of it that those leading the assault today represent the great brewery State, the State of Missouri.

I do not intend to get emotional on this point or get into a diatribe against that great industry.

Alcohol use and abuse, I submit, if we are going to get into comparative studies here, is an infinitely greater threat to the public health of this country than smoking. I have never known a smoker to drive a car and kill anybody, but beer drinkers do it.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. EAST. I shall be finished in a moment.

I had indicated my principal concern here is a revenue one, that we are going to be counterproductive because of the tax burden we are laying upon it. It goes contrary to New Federalism and I think violates good tax policy because the tax is not used now to raise revenue but to be punitive, to punish.

It is a revenue question I raise. What I am simply trying to counter in my own feeble way is the great emotional argument that is made about smoking and health. Let us not let that one overwhelm us in our judgment on good revenue policy, lest all of a sudden, having beaten cigarettes down to a point that no one can buy them because of the heavy tax on them, we begin to do the same thing against beer, to the great trepidation, I am sure, of the distinguished Senators from Missouri.

Enough is enough. The problem is revenue and proper revenue policy. It ought not to be overwhelmed by the emotional issue of health. That is the distinction I am asking my colleagues to make here.

It seems to me we are too frequently getting overwhelmed with the emotion of health rather than the substantive question of revenue policy. I am simply trying to put it into perspective, Madam President.

I deeply appreciate the yielding to me of the floor manager and the senior Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY. Madam President, let us just be clear for the record that, if the Senator from Missouri had not asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment that reduced the tax to 4 cents on a pack of cigarettes, the Senator from New Jersey would have. The Senator from New Jersey, unfortunately, does not have either tobacco or giant breweries in his State. There is one, only one, but not significant. I think this was a yeas and nays call on the excise tax question, not on the health question.

(The names of the following Senators were added as cosponsors of the amendment, as modified: Mr. THURMOND, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. EAST, and Mr. WARNER.)

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I feel that a great many people do not understand, really, the importance of tobacco from an economic standpoint. I just want to mention that it is the fifth most valuable crop in the United States. It is the first most valuable from a monetary standpoint in South Carolina. This industry employs over 1 million people. It pays $621 million per year in income to workers. Over $1 billion per year worth of machinery is used by this industry.

Personally, Madam President, I do not smoke. I think it is detrimental to smoke. But a lot of people get relaxation from smoking. A lot of people are going to smoke anyway, just as a lot of people drink. It seems to me that it is not fair to put such an undue heavy tax on tobacco when hard liquor represents to the public and society much more harm than tobacco does.

It seems to me it would certainly be fair to sunset this matter, because we are increasing this tobacco tax by 100 percent—not 50 percent, 100 percent. Then why not sunset it at the end of 3 years? That would seem to be fair and then another look can be taken at the situation, as it will be taken with regard to other taxes.

That is all this does, Madam President. It merely brings it back to the present tax after 3 years. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. EAGLETON. Madam President, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. EAGLETON. Madam President, just a brief rejoinder to the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will suspend, there is only 1 minute remaining to the Senator from Kansas on the amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Madam President, I yield what time the Senator needs off the bill.

Mr. EAGLETON. I need 4 minutes, Madam President.

I have just a brief rejoinder to my colleague from North Carolina (Mr. EAST).

The whole world knows beer is the "beverage of moderation;" it is the mother's milk of American Legion picnics, the sine qua non of a summer evening of professional baseball. It is all that is "good and true;" indeed, it "made Milwaukee famous."

With respect to my home city of St. Louis, we once proudly had the title: "first in booze, first in shoes, and last in the American League." We lost our American League team, our shoes went to Taiwan and Korea. God, do not take from us our beer.

Madam President, the Senator says "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." That is a verbatim quote from page 182 of Julia Child's newest cookbook, "The Utilization of Beer in the Cooking of a Goose."

Beer has the collateral significance that it is a very excellent hair rinse.

Finally, Madam President(if you were tk carry the logic of Senator EAST to its ultimate(you would be doing a great blaspheiy tk the President of the United States. At this very moment, the President is winging his way to St. Louis at the invitation of August S. Busch III, president of Anheuser Busch, Inc., so that the two of them can be seated on the dais tonight at an illustrious dinner.

Madam President, remember the immortal words of William Butler Yeats:

A statesman is an easy man,
He tells his lies by rote;
A journalist makes up his lies
And takes you by the throat;
So stay at home and drink your beer
And let the neighbors vote."

Finally, Madam President, remember what made this country what it is today: "Rednecks, white sox, and Blue Ribbon beer."

Mr. MATTINGLY. Madam President, I should like to associate myself with this amendment. I say the idea of the senior Senator from South Carolina may not be a bad idea; we may want to sunset this whole tax bill.

Mr. HELMS. I want to sunset the whole U.S. Senate.

Madam President, I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, has all time expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute and twenty-three seconds remain to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I think we have had enough smoke. We are ready for the fire.

I shall just say, as was indicated yesterday, I certainly want to be freed from the charge of unfairness. I just cannot stand here and hear it said that I am unfair to smokers or to people who use the telephone. I hope this amendment will be adopted. Then we shall sunset this tax and, in 1985, I assume by then it will all be wrapped in the New Federalism and will not be a concern of the Federal Government in any event. The average State tax now is about 15 cents or 20 cents a pack. Maybe 4 cents or 8 cents more would be sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina as modified. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 37, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Inouye	Kennedy	Metzenbaum

So Mr. HELMS' amendment (UP No. 1113), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. EAGLETON addressed the Chair.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Madam President, the Senate is not in order. Could we have order so we can hear the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is correct. The Senate will be in order.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1114

(Purpose: To require integrated oil companies to include disallowed intangible drilling costs in the basis of the property)

Mr. EAGLETON. Madam President, I have an amendment at the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator's amendment will be in order at this time. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1114.

Mr. EAGLETON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 212, line 14, insert "(other than any amount not so allowable to a taxpayer which is an integrated oil company)" after "263(c)".

On page 215, strike out lines 1 through 5.

On page 215, line 6, strike out "(B)" and insert in lieu thereof "(A)".

On page 215, line 19, strike out "(C)" and insert in lieu thereof "(B)".

On page 215, line 13, strike out "(D)" and insert in lieu thereof "(C)".

On page 445, beginning with line 1, strike out everything through line 22;

On page 446, beginning with line 1, strike out everything through line 4.

Mr. EAGLETON. Madam President, the amendment that is now before us is an amendment to section 206 of the bill which provides a 15-percent reduction in certain corporate preference items. Specifically, I propose to amend section (b) on page 212 which deals with special rules for treatment of intangible drilling costs. I would retain the section in the bill which reduces by 15 percent the deduction allowable for intangible drilling costs under section 263(c) of the Tax Code. However, I would strike the section of the bill which permits this 15 percent reduction to be treated as if it were recovery property assigned to the 5-year class. I would not make available the ACRS deductions and the investment tax credit; instead, that 15 percent would be treated as if it were a capital cost to the well. My amendment will only impact the integrated oil companies; it is not intended to impact mining development or mining exploration companies. Furthermore, I do not intend my amendment to have any effect on the individual minimum tax.

Because this proposal would raise additional revenue, at the same time, I also intend to strike section 284 of the bill which extends the telephone excise tax.

Madam President, the telephone has become a necessity of life. Most families around the country are already experiencing increased charges for telephone service. The telephone excise tax was originally enacted during World War II as a temporary tax. Between 1941 and 1973, the tax was levied at 10 percent. Gradually, Conress began to phase this tax out, always providing for an expiration date. However, every time the tax was scheduled to expire, Congress found it necessary to extend the tax.

On Monday, the distinguished Senator from Kansas delivered his opening remarks outlining the tax bill. In those remarks, he referred to the proposed increase in the telephone tax as "a very minimal increase." Yet he neglected to mention in this defense of the bill that many of those he is asking to share the misery of new taxes have already borne the brunt of past budget cuts and the impact of the Reagan recession. What may seem small change to the Senator from Kansas can be a significant burden to an elderly person living on a reduced pension. What may be regarded by the Senator from Kansas as an equitable sharing of the tax burden can be a real sacrifice for an unemployed family already counting its pennies toward the next week's food bill. Between 1983 and 1987, the telephone excise tax will add nearly $6 billion to the Nation's telephone bills. In my opinion, and I believe that the American people, this is not small change.

In my opinion, the action taken by the Finance Committee with regard to intangible drilling costs raises the specter of last year's tax leasing fiasco. The tax leasing provision was a part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act, but it was considered at the time to be a relatively minor provision. Since that time, it has come to be one of the most controversial provisions resulting from that bill. It has made a mockery of the Tax Code in that it has allowed, in many cases, an unjustified taxpayer subsidy of some of the wealthiest corporations in America. Mr. President, this year's provision allowing the integrated oil companies to take ACRS deductions and the investment tax credit for intangible expenses has all the earmarkings of becoming a "son of tax leasing."

Tax deductions for intangible drilling costs allow companies to have large and immediate tax writeoffs. By expensing rather than capitalizing these costs, taxes on income for the oil companies are deferred, with the result being equivalent to an interest-free loan in the amount of the delayed tax liability. Typically, these intangible expenses account for 75 percent to 90 percent of total cost. According to the Congressional Budget Office, if expensing were repealed completely, Federal revenues would increase by $38 billion over the next 5 years. Moreover, the expensing of intangible drilling costs is an inefficient subsidy since it provides the same incentive for low-risk drilling in already developed and producing fields as it does for high-risk exploratory drilling.

CBO has further stated that the expensing of intangible drilling costs provides significant tax savings to the major oil companies. In 1980, for example, the expensing of intangibles reduced Gulf's effective tax rate by 5.9 percentage points, Exxon's by 4.2 percentage points, Atlantic Richfield's by 6.7 percentage points, and Standard Oil of Indiana by 5.6 percentage points. On top of this, last year, the Congress allowed the oil companies an additional $33 billion over the next 10 years during consideration of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

H.R. 4961 lumps together eight provisions which reduce certain corporate preference items, including the provision relating to intangible drilling costs. Of the total amount of revenue to be raised by those provisions, the committee's proposed reductions in intangible drilling costs will net approximately $200 million in fiscal year 1983, $400 million in fiscal year 1984, $300 million in fiscal year 1985, $200 million in fiscal year 1986, and $100 million in fiscal year 1987—a total of $1.2 billion. By contrast, the provision raising the floor for medical deductions from 3 percent to 10 percent would net $10.7 billion over the same period. As you can see, compared to individual taxpayers, the major oil companies fare quite well.

Therefore, my amendment—which does not go nearly far enough to suit me, but falls within the scope of this bill—adds an additional $100 million in fiscal year 1983, $300 million in fiscal year 1984, $400 million in fiscal year 1985, $500 million in fiscal year 1986, and $700 million in fiscal year 1987 to the bill, according to revenue estimates provided me by the Joint Committee on Taxation.

Madam President, H.R. 4961 is known as the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. Let us take a small step toward both of those lofty goals, and that small step would be the adoption of this amendment which, on the one hand, would repeal the telephone excise tax provision in the bill and, on the other hand, would restore roughly $2 billion to the Federal Treasury from the integrated oil companies.

Finally, Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt dealing with the "Expensing of Intangible Drilling Costs," as prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in February 1982, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPEAL EXPENSING OF INTANGIBLE OIL AND GAS DRILLING COSTS (B-270-C)

[In billions of dollars]

	Annual added revenues					Cumulative 5-year addition
Addition to CBO baseline	3.5	7.7	8.4	9.0	9.6	38.2

Under standard accounting practices, the cost of acquiring or improving an asset designed to produce income over several years is recaptured by a depreciation allowance spread over the useful life of the asset. Taxpayers engaged in oil and gas drilling, however, can generally deduct the amount spent on "intangible drilling costs" in the year that the expenditure is made—that is, they may "expense," rather than "capitalize," the qualifying costs. The costs that are permitted this special treatment include amounts paid for fuel, labor, repairs, hauling, and supplies that are used in drilling oil and gas wells; the costs of clearing ground in preparation for drilling; and the intangible (that is, nonsalvageable) costs of constructing derricks, tanks, pipelines, and other structures and equipment necessary for the drilling and preparation of wells. Typically, these outlays account for 75 to 90 percent of total costs. By expensing rather than capitalizing these costs, taxes on income are effectively deferred; the difference is equivalent to an interest-free loan in the amount of the delayed tax liability. If expensing was repealed, federal revenues would increase by about $38.2 billion over the 1983-1987 period.

The major argument for repeal is that the subsidy is no longer necessary in light of the sharp increases in oil and gas prices in recent years, the decontrol of all domestically produced oil in January 1981, and the scheduled decontrol of new natural gas in 1985. [Moreover, the expensing of intangible drilling costs is an inefficient subsidy since it provides the same incentive for low-risk drilling in already developed and producing fields as it does for high-risk exploratory drilling.] If intangible drilling costs were required to be capitalized, the costs of dry holes could continue to be written off immediately under normal accounting rules. This standard tax treatment would give exploratory drilling a comparative advantage over developmental drilling, thereby encouraging more exploration.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Who yields time?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may desire to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand this amendment, it would add an additional $2 billion of taxes on the major oil companies over a period of the next 5 years.

Mr. President, Senators will note from looking at the committee report on page 103 that this bill already includes an increase in the tax on those same companies. In the main, the increase on the major companies that do business overseas averages about $500 million a year—$504 million in fiscal year 1984, $581 million in 1985, and going up to $708 million in 1987.

Mr. President, this Nation needs energy desperately. Notwithstanding that, 40 percent of the drilling rigs in this country are now stacked. They are not being used; they are laid up. This amendment would tax the operation of this industry within the Unites States as well as overseas. Over the next 5 years, it would add another $2 billion of taxes on an industry that is already depressed with a real cash flow problem.

The reason the companies are stacking their rigs is that with the decline in the price of oil, they simply do not have the cash flow to operate at full capacity in their drilling operations. This would put additional taxes on them on top of the $500 million a year that is already in the bill.

To do that, Mr. President, is to discriminate against this industry. But beyond that, it would reduce this Nation's ability to produce energy. It would make this Nation more and more dependent on Near East oil which is not a safe supply of energy at all, and these imports hurt our balance of payments. Putting these additional taxes on would be a matter of cutting off one's nose to spite one's face.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to delete the tax increase on telephone use. I have no interest in raising the tax on telephone use. In fact, I will offer an amendment to delete that tax increase, and Senators can vote on the telephone use tax increase, up or down, on its own merits.

But I do not think, Mr. President, that it is appropriate to further crucify one industry or to cut back on our energy production, as this would undoubtedly do, because the industry is already having to cut back on its operations because of a cash flow problem which this would tend to exacerbate.

There is already enough of a tax increase on the oil industry in the bill to cut back on energy production, and we should not cut back on it further with more taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am not one of those who thinks that the weight of an argument depends upon its length, so I am going to be very brief.

In the bill which has been reported, the Finance Committee cut back severely on the tax benefits which are available to major oil companies. The committee bill forces the majors to capitalize 15 percent of their intangible drilling costs and cut back on the use of foreign tax credits abroad.

Now, the report of the committee does take a step which, at least in the opinion of some Senators, including the Senator from Colorado, is a serious and important reform.

But the amendment which is suggested by the Senator from Missouri goes well beyond this and its effect will be very harsh in its treatment of the major oil companies.

I am advised by counsel that under the Eagleton amendment a major oil company would lose entirely 15 percent of its intangible drilling costs. This is a very harsh result. Under the amendment, an oil company which spends, just to take a figure, $100 in some domestic oil exploration could recover only $85 of its costs. This would put oil companies in a worse position than any other industry in America.

I am not certain that that is the intent of the sponsor of the amendment, but I am advised by counsel that that is, in fact, the effect as it is presently drafted.

In any event, whether or not it is considered on the basis of its actual effect as drafted according to the opinion of counsel, or whether or not it is considered on the basis of what I believe to be the intent of the sponsor of the amendment, I am not for it and I hope that a majority of my colleagues will turn it down.

As far as we are concerned on this side, unless other Senators seek recognition, I think we are ready to go to a vote. Does the Senator from Oklahoma wish to speak on this matter?

Mr. NICKLES. Not at this time. I do wish to have my remarks associated with the remarks of the Senator from Colorado in urging the defeat of this amendment. I think it is very counterproductive and very penalizing to the particular industry and I would urge its defeat.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I will take 1 minute and then we can proceed to vote. I would like to clarify one comment the Senator from Colorado made.

The 15 percent would not be totally lost to the integrated oil companies. Instead of it being qualified, as the tax bill before us seeks to do, for ACRS deductions and the investment tax credit, that 15 percent would still qualify for normal deduction purposes over the 10-year period. So it is not totally lost to the industry at all. It just is not qualified for the special treatment of the investment tax credit and ACRS deductions.

With that clarification, unless anyone else wishes to be heard, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have an estimate of the revenues involved in this measure. The estimate handed me is somewhat at variance with the figures that I quoted previously because it relates to 3 years rather than 5. I think I should make the figures available for the record, and I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the RECORD so Senators may read it.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVENUES UNDER EAGLETON AMENDMENT COMPARED WITH COMMITTEE BILL

[Dollars in millions]

	Fiscal year—			3 years
	1983	1984	1985
Delete telephone excise tax increase	−$308	−$881	−$1,600	−$2,789
Deny ACRS and investment tax credit for 15 percent of intangible drilling costs of integrated oil companies (assuming cost depletion can be used on the 15 percent that is capitalized)	+105	+275	+402	+782
Net revenue loss under Eagleton amendment	−203	−606	−1,198	−2,007

Mr. EAGLETON. May I ask what those figures show?

Mr. LONG. What this shows is that by deleting the telephone excise tax increase over a 3-year period, the Treasury would lose, compared to the committee bill, $2.789 billion, and that to deny the ACRS an investment tax credit for 15 percent of intangible drilling costs, as suggested by the Senator, would pick up $782 million. I thought it might be more than that, but the estimates indicate for fiscal year 1983 a pickup of $105 million; fiscal year 1984, a pickup of $275 million; and for fiscal year 1985, a pickup of $402 million, for a total of $782 million over the 3 years. The two provisions of the amendment taken together would result in a net loss to the Treasury of $2.007 billion compared to the committee bill.

Mr. EAGLETON. I did not hear precisely what the Senator said. Did the Senator say the telephone tax over 3 years would be about $2 billion?

Mr. LONG. $2,789,000,000.

Mr. EAGLETON. And the intangible drilling would be what?

Mr. LONG. $782 million. The amendment overall would be a net loss to the Treasury of $2 billion compared with the committee bill. I think that Senators voting on this amendment ought to keep this revenue loss in mind. I know the Senator from Kansas is not here to ask the question, which he would ask if he were here: where do we get the money back?

I think Senators ought to keep that in mind when they vote on the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President. I believe we are nearly ready to go to a vote. I am willing to suggest the absence of a quorum just so that we can advise the chairman that debate has concluded on this. He is nearby and I think will have no objection to a vote occurring. It would be my thought that we ought to at least let him know that we are at that stage in case he wishes to speak on the matter.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Unless other Senators seek recognition, I will at this time suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. All time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) is necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 72, as follows:

So Mr. EAGLETON's amendment (UP No. 1114) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we have been trying to keep some semblance of a running list here going back and forth. Senator SPECTER is next on the agenda, and I understand that will not take a great deal of time, and then Senator ARMSTRONG, unless there is somebody on the other side who has an amendment that we can dispose of. I know Senator GLENN will have something later on.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

DEPLETION ALLOWANCE

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I had intended to introduce an amendment to the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 to eliminate the 15-percent reduction in the percentage depletion allowance for the coal and iron ore industries. I had intended to do so because I thought the amendment was necessary in order to insure the economic health and growth of those two industries which are vital to the Nation's economic and national security interests.

It is now not necessary to do so because a compromise has been worked out with the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) on behalf of the committee where the date would be deferred for 1 year, which will give the necessary relief to the two relevant industries.

The statement I intended to make is as follows:

I oppose the proposed reductions in depletion allowances contained in the Finance Committee bill. This is probably the worst time to be raising the taxes of the coal and iron ore firms. The iron ore industry is currently operation at 6 percent of capacity, and approximately 70 percent or 15,000, of the industry's workers have been laid-off. The coal industry is also experiencing severe economic hardship; unemployment in the industry has reached 40,000 workers. There is no sound justification for reducing the depletion allowances at a time when both these industries are in such a depressed state.

The original Finance Committee proposal called for a 15-percent reduction in the percentage depletion allowance for all hard rock minerals. During markup, it was determined that the effects of this action would be too severe upon the depressed mining industry, so the reduction in the percentage depletion allowance was eliminated for all industries except coal and iron ore.

I fail to see the logic of the committee's action, and I believe that it is unfair to single out these two industries. It is true that the mining industry has been hard hit by the recession; but the coal and iron ore industries have been as severely affected as other mining industries. In fact, capacity utilization in the iron ore industry is the lowest of all mining industries.

Capacity utilization in the coal industry is also low—now about 80 percent. The unemployment rate of 16.1 percent in coal is 6.5 points above the national average and over 4 points higher than the average unemployment level in the mining industry as a whole.

Mr. President, the reduction in depletion allowances is not only bad economic policy, it is also based upon false assumptions concerning the tax treatment of mined coal and iron ore. The Finance Committee proposal was justified on the grounds that the coal and iron ore industries received special treatment under section 631 of the Internal Revenue Code, which permits a capital gains type treatment for the royalties received by a mine owner from the operator of that mine. Section 631 is of doubtful relevance to depletion allowances, because the benefits of the capital gains treatment accrue to owners, while the provisions of this bill affect operators.

The increased tax benefits and cash flow resulting from section 631 do not necessarily accrue to iron ore and coal companies, therefore, many companies will be as adversely affected by the reduced depletion allowance as the other mining companies would have been. The coal and iron ore industries do not receive special treatment—as some have asserted—under section 631; their depletion allowances are treated in the same manner as any other mining industry.

Many of the companies affected by this provision are in a seriously depressed state, so the budgetary impact is minimal, approximately $100 million annually in fiscal year 1983 and 1984. However, the impact of this bill will be much greater in future years when it is expected that these companies will be more profitable.

The coal industry estimates that it will have to invest about $50 billion over the next 20 years to meet the Nation's energy needs. Steel industry investment will be even higher. I question the wisdom of a bill which will exacerbate the critical cash flow problems in these industries and reduce the incentives to invest in them.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1115

(Purpose: To delay for 1 year the reduction in percentage depletion for coal and iron ore)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is in order at this time. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER) on behalf of himself, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. WALLOP, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1115.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 221, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following:

(5) REDUCTION IN PERCENTAGE DEPLETION FOR COAL AND IRON ORE.—Section 291(a)(2) of such code shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

On page 221, line 21, strike out "(5)" and insert in lieu thereof "(6)".

On page 222, line 2, after "applies" insert ", except that in the case of an item described in section 291(a)(2) of such code, such amendment shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983".

Mr. SPECTER. I ask unanimous consent to add Senator HEINZ and Senator DURENBERGER as original cosponsors of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania; I was busy in another conversation. Is this the modification to the original amendment?

Mr. SPECTER. This is the modification. I had elected to proceed not to introduce the original amendment but to say that I had intended to introduce the amendment and to say it was not necessary because of the accommodation which the distinguished Senator from Kansas had worked out, so that the amendment which I have submitted is limited to deferring the date when the tax change becomes effective to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

Mr. DOLE. That is the understanding that we had reached with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I am prepared to accept the amendment. I do not know of any objection to the amendment.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas for this agreement. I think that it is a very wise accommodation because it gives beneficial tax treatment to these very important industries for the next year. There will be sufficient time in the interim to evaluate the events which shall transpire and to revisit this subject if it should become necessary, but for the moment it accommodates the interest of these industries which are so very important not only to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which I represent, but to the Nation as a whole.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished Senator, and I certainly agree with his remarks. We appreciate his diligence in calling this to our attention and, of course, are pleased we were able to accommodate him in this request.

I yield back all time we have on the amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield back his time?

Mr. SPECTER. I do.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment (UP No. 1115) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Colorado is next. Following him will be the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY).

I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time not to be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment I shall propose be in order at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1116

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1116.

Beginning on page 222, line 3, strike Sec. 207 (Amendments to Investment Credit.).

Strike Sec. 208 (Repeal of 1985 and 1986 Increases in Accelerated Cost Recovery Deductions.).

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, prior to the passage of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, two of the most pressing economic problems facing this Nation were declining productivity and loss of competitiveness with other nations. Both of these problems resulted from inadequate capital investment in new plant equipment. As a result of inadequate capital investment, the United States ranked behind its major trading partners in most economic indicators, particularly those dealing with productivity.

To reverse these trends of declining productivity and loss of competitiveness with other nations, Congress passed the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 which, among other things, addressed these problems and included provisions aimed at stimulating capital investment. In the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 report, issued by the Senate Committee on Finance, the committee stated the following concerning the need for business tax incentive provisions:

The committee believes that present rules for determining depreciation allowances and the investment tax credit need to be replaced because they do not provide the investment stimulus that is essential for economic expansion. * * * The committee agrees with numerous witnesses who testified that a substantial restructuring of depreciation deductions and the investment tax credit will be an effective way of stimulating capital formation, increasing productivity and improving the Nation's competitiveness in international trade. The committee therefore believes that a new capital cost recovery system is required which provides for the more rapid acceleration of cost recovery deductions and maintains or increases the investment tax credit.

I applaud the efforts of Congress last year to recognize and address the need for incentives to stimulate capital investment. However, this year, we are hearing that the provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act designed to foster business investment went too far and, in some cases, provide incentives for uneconomic investments. I disagree. The need for incentives to encourage capital formation exist today as it did before passage of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. We cannot afford to take a step backwards in this area.

Mr. President, the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 was proposed and enacted as a multiyear tax act. Both the administration and the Congress promoted the need for a multiyear tax act to provide a stable tax environment for business. Without such a stable tax environment, American business is unable to make intelligent investment decisions. Many companies either have commenced or are planning major capital investments which are to be placed in service in future years. These investments were initiated in large part due to the commitment made by the administration and Congress that the tax package enacted in 1981 would continue in place. The modifications, as proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, may well make these investments financially impossible. Moreover, the modifications, as proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, may retard investment decisions because of the fear that in years to come we will further chip away the incentives for capital formation which were enacted last year.

The administration and Congress agreed that the U.S. economy needed new investment last year. It still does. Creating an increased tax burden on new investment is simply the wrong medicine to encourage further capital investment.

For the foregoing reasons, I think it is imperative that we strike sections 207 and 208 of H.R. 4961, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, if we are to hope for future capital investment on the part of business and individuals of our country.

(Mr. MURKOWSKI assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Has the Senator from Georgia concluded his remarks?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Not concluded, but if the Senator would like to ask some questions I would certainly be happy to answer them.

Mr. DOLE. I am just trying to determine if you delete the investment tax credit base adjustment and delete repeal of 1985-86 ACRS changes, and the third part—which takes the 85 percent of tax liability up to 90 percent—I guess I am interested in knowing what revenue would be involved. I think it is about $46 billion, $48 billion over 5 years; $6.5 billion over 3 years.

I do not quarrel with much of what the distinguished Senator said. I am not certain whether we have more than $98.3 billion or less at this point. We hope to have that when we finish. We have got an interaction committee working and they are doing a lot of interaction to see if we can squeeze a few dollars here or there. But I do not think it would be possible in any of the alternatives we are considering in the event something should be deleted from the bill to cover that, plus the $6.5 billion.

I do not quarrel with the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia that what we are doing, in effect, is undoing what we did less than a year ago or about a year ago. But we have been discussing some possible compromise of this proposal with the Treasury Department, with the administration, as has the Senator from Georgia, and it is my understanding that nothing can be worked out to the satisfaction of everyone involved.

The Secretary of the Treasury stated, and we have made the point, too—in fact, we were criticized last year in the committee, a number of witnesses and some members of the committee said our system was so generous that it was more generous than expensing, and the Secretary of the Treasury said more recently that we should not have a system that is more generous than expensing. It is equivalent to a negative tax rate or subsidy.

That was not the intent of the law we passed last year. So I just hope we will not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

I would be pleased, in fact I ask unanimous consent, to place in the RECORD at this point some talking points and information with reference to the amendment. But I hope we might be able to vote on the amendment as soon as the Senator from Georgia and others who wish to speak have done so.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The partial basis adjustment provided by the bill modifies ACRS so that a taxpayer will in effect expense his equipment costs for tax purposes, just as he actually expenses his costs for labor and materials. When a businessman spends $1,000 on machinery, he will get depreciation deductions and an investment credit which, under the bill, are economically equivalent to his deducting the entire $1,000 in the same year that he spends it.

Expensing is the right target for ACRS for several reasons:

First, common sense says that you should not get tax benefits for spending more than you actually spent.

Second, expensing gives the same incentives to invest in equipment and machinery as would exist if there were no corporate income tax at all.

Third, tax benefits which are more generous than expensing—which are what we have without the partial basis adjustment—are an undesirable subsidy to business. Tax write-offs from buying an asset can be greater than the income the asset produces. This is what the President's Council of Economic Advisors has rightly called a negative effective tax rate.

This is unfair to other taxpayers who must pay the subsidy. It is also bad economic policy to have uneconomic investment that doesn't generate enough income in the marketplace to justify the cost of the asset.

So we should get the benefits of ACRS down to the equivalent of expensing. Secretary Regan says that this is the right target. The partial basis adjustment in the bill before the Senate puts ACRS benefits in exactly the right place.

The committee bill repeals the provisions of ACRS that would have accelerated cost recovery rates for personal property to rates approximating the benefits of using a 175-percent declining balance method in 1985 and the 200-percent declining balance method after 1985.

Without the modification, ACRS will be substantially more generous with enormous pressure being put on the taxpayers to invest in machines rather than in buildings.

When ACRS was enacted last summer it was not clear that the inflation rate would come down so quickly. It is this reduction in the inflation rate—and the related decline in the discount rate—that dictates elimination of the 1985 and 1986 changes in ACRS.

After the changes made by the committee bill, ACRS plus the ITC will provide approximately the same benefits as a complete exemption from tax for the income from assets in the 3-year and 5-year classes.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Could I ask a question referring to the costs? Approximately $40 billion the Senator is talking about out of the private sector comes in the outyears of 1986 and 1987, so the impact in the 3 years we are referring to this bill takes into consideration, 1983, 1984, and 1985, is not that great.

Mr. DOLE. It is about $6.5 billion.

Mr. MATTINGLY. That really does not take into consideration—I hate to use the term—"reflows" but what will happen, what happens when we take away or are not consistent with the tax policies of our country, that we passed one bill last year and so we decide to come back here this year and we are going to pass and change it again, and next year we are going to come back and we will probably try to change it again?

If I were an individual out in America I would probably ask the question I wonder what is going on? The question is is it reliable enough for me to really want to invest? The question should be on any of these items in this Finance Committee bill, which I am sure the distinguished chairman agrees with, the question is does it encourage or discourage people? Does it encourage or discourage investment? Does it encourage or discourage savings? Does it encourage or discourage productivity in America?

The only thing I am saying, especially with these amendments, is that they are obviously going to be an anchor around the private sector. They are probably not going to hurt the Government so much, but it is going to be a detriment to the private sector. I doubt that we have a computer up here in Washington, D.C., that could produce something about reflows, but I would say the encouragement factor if we keep it the way it is now in the tax code would be greater, we would have a greater opportunity possibly to have business expanding in America, if we left the tax legislation in this ACRS and ITC the same way than the way the Senator is projecting a loss by the Finance Committee figures.

It is not really a disagreement over philosophy. I think it is just being pragmatic. This change, will it be stable? Is it reliable? Does it encourage decisionmaking? Does shifting our policy every 9 or 10 months help?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, again I will say very briefly, because we have a number of amendments, I think it is helpful that the Senator from Georgia has presented the amendment. I know there is a great deal of interest in the business community for this amendment, a great deal of support for it. The Senator from Kansas talked to representatives of the Business Round Table, an outstanding group of businessmen, the National Association of Manufacturers, the chamber of commerce, all of whom feel very strongly that what we are doing here in essence is pulling the rug out from under what was done last year.

But, notwithstanding that, it seems to me that expensing is the right target for ACRS for several reasons.

First, commonsense would dictate you should not get tax benefits for spending more than you actually spent. And it has been indicated and demonstated and stated by the Treasury Secretary that that ought to be the case.

Second, expensing gives the same incentives to invest in equipment and machinery as would exist if there were no corporate income tax at all. In fact, some are better off without a tax. And they are more generous than expensing, and we believe we have made the right changes in the Senate Finance Committee.

We know that there are some complaints because we changed the acceleration of ACRS scheduled for 1985 and 1986.

But it seems to me it would be unfair to the American taxpayers to ask them to subsidize what is a very generous, in my view, tax policy.

But I think the importance of calling up the amendment and indicating to those of us in Congress, those of us on the Senate Finance Committee and to the administration, that we cannot tinker with this tax bill every year will be helpful if somebody indicates that that should be done again next year.

So I must say there will be a lot of interest in the so-called flat rate tax. And if we do anything in the flat rate tax—I do not suggest we will do it that quickly—we cannot address just the individual side and leave out the business side or the corporate side.

I hope that the distinguished Senator from Georgia would not press the amendment, but if he desires an up or down vote, we are prepared to vote.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, just in conclusion, I think sections 207 and 208 of the committee measure, which are intended to modify existing law concerning the ACRS and the basic adjustment as a result of investment tax credit, will have a negative economic effect and, in turn, will lower revenue. That is my feeling of a lot of people.

I do have a reservation about whether the negative economic impact is included in the revenue provisions.

Enactment of sections 207 and 208 will be an additional tax on individual businesses of our country and, in this regard, it would discourage savings and investment.

In conclusion, I will say I think the chairman has done an outstanding job in the Finance Committee with respect to plugging up loopholes and in compliance. It is just in the arena of raising taxes is where I have to leave the ship.

Mr. DOLE. We are not certain where the ship is going.

Mr. MATTINGLY. That is the reason I was trying to make sure the rudder was in the right place.

Mr. DOLE. Unless you have a destination, do not leave the ship. We may be sailing around the Chamber and never get out of the Chamber.

But I hope that in the final analysis the Senator will decide that the Senate Finance Committee and the members of that committee looked long and hard at ways to raise the revenue without doing violence to anyone. Even though the business community would like to have this amendment, they are, with some reluctance, supporting the bill, because they are concerned about big deficits, they are concerned about high interest rates, they are concerned about people being out of work, and they are concerned about their businesses.

They are not so much concerned about what is going to happen in 1985, 1986, and 1987. They are concerned about what is going to happen this year. Are they going to have their doors open at the end of the year? Are they going to be in business next year?

For that reason, if we do not act on this package, then we have abdicated all responsibilities in the U.S. Senate as leaders in an effort to face up to the hard facts.

I am not an expert on reflow or feedback. I heard that from the Congressman from New York for a long time. But all this feedback, you just keep cutting taxes and get all this feedback and we have had all of that feedback we can eat. So we are working on it, and we hope that we can pass this bill soon.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I strongly support this amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Georgia, Senator MATTINGLY. Last year, in the Economic Recovery Tax Act, the Senate approved a number of important changes in our tax laws, which were aimed at increasing capital investment and, in turn, restoring productivity, providing jobs, and stimulating economic recovery. I believe the Finance Committee proposal to dilute the investment tax credit and repeal the 1985 and 1986 improvements in the accelerated cost recovery system would severely undermine these investment incentives. In my opinion, these changes will have a major adverse impact on business confidence and economic recovery. At a time when businesses all over this country are struggling to survive, I believe it would be a serious mistake to remove these important incentives for capital investment we enacted last year. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would like to insist that the rollcall be 15 minutes. That is how it is supposed to be under the rules, and I would like to insist it be 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 72, as follows:

NOT VOTING—5

Denton	Kennedy	Metzenbaum
Inouye	Melcher

So Mr. MATTINGLY's amendment (UP No. 1116) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ABDNOR. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, may we have order?

I do not know if the distinguished majority leader is here. It is my hope that the majority leader and minority leader may agree on some procedures—first, let me determine how much time is left on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has 3 hours and 9 minutes. The Senator from West Virginia has 3 hours and 24 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. So we have about 6 hours and 30 minutes left on the bill. It is now 3:30 p.m. There are a number of amendments. I am hoping that the leaders might get together and agree—because there are a lot of people ready to introduce amendments—to reduce the time on the amendments to 30 minutes with the exception of the one on withholding, where we would retain the full hour. It may take some time to win that one. It may take more than 3 hours.

Maybe the distinguished majority leader could make that request in the next few minutes.

In the meantime, the distinguished Senator from Colorado has an amendment, then the distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL). Senator ANDREWS and Senator BAUCUS may be prepared at that time. Then we are getting down to Senator HOLLINGS and Senator KASTEN—or getting up, depending on how you view that amendment.

Mr. President, I promised the distinguished Senator from New York that we would dispose of an amendment that he has. He has a time problem, so we hope to be able to get to his amendment immediately after the withholding amendment.

I think we can move rather quickly. There may be Senators who are prepared to offer amendments that we do not have on the list. We do not have that many. I am not encouraging more amendments, but if there are, we should know about those soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), when will we get to that amendment? I have been now, for more than 2 days, requesting a slot. I find that each time, it is said, "when we get to withholding." I do not know when we are going to get to withholding.

I ask my distinguished colleague from Kansas if he could not be more definitive. We have a number of proposals. We offered to compromise. If he cannot take the compromise, I am willing to submit the amendment as I initially proposed it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I might say if it is a compromise, it is one we both want to submit. It is not the one the Senator is now willing to submit. That is where we have the problem. The Senator wants to compromise on his terms.

Mr. D'AMATO. I am willing to submit it. I think I am entitled to have an opportunity to do that.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator will have an opportunity. We are trying to work it out. There are a lot of amendments, probably 35 or 40 amendments. We are moving as quickly as we can.

Mr. D'AMATO. At the risk, again, of asking for a time certain that we can vote on the compromise on the amendment as I have proposed it, I am going to be constrained to object to other amendments being introduced.

Mr. DOLE. That is a right the Senator has. I would not want to think that I cannot do any business with the Senator from New York.

Mr. D'AMATO. It might be said that the Senator from New York has had a great deal of difficulty, as other Senators, doing business with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. I have not noted that until now.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair, how much time remains of the 20 hours under the statute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has 3 hours and 6 minutes; the minority leader has 3 hours and 24 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is clear that we are going to have a long day, as I indicated earlier. Thursday being our late day, it is my hope and my expectation that we can finish this bill. I am not inclined to ask the Senate to remain past midnight tonight. If we have not passed the bill by then, we shall have to go over until tomorrow and finish it on Friday. In order to maximize the prospects that we can finish it tonight and have it over with, I wonder if Senators would be willing to agree that, on all amendments except the amendment dealing with interest and dividend withholding, there will be a 30-minute time limitation, with the time to be equally divided.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, is that a request?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I make that request.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I shall have to object at this point until we have an opportunity to run our lines.

In the first place, I do not think this is a reconciliation bill, by virtue of the fact that article IV was included in the bill in violation of paragraph 5 of rule XV. So I do not think the bill will be covered by the time limit.

I do not think the bill ought to be covered by a time limit. For that reason, I will object at this point.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will ask that Senators on my side of the aisle be on notice that I will renew that request sometime at about 4 o'clock, assuming that the minority leader has had an opportunity by then to complete his list on that side.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield first to the ranking member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. LONG. I just want to suggest, and even make this plea to the leader on my side of the aisle, when the question comes up again that we do consider reducing the time to one-half hour on each of these amendments. Even though I understand how the Senator feels about the matter, the fact is that we are going to vote on the bill. To cut the time for each amendment in half would enable us to fit in twice as many amendments; otherwise, just the pure mathematics of it means that a great number of Senators are just not going to have a chance to be heard or, if they are heard, Senators will be so exhausted by that time that they may not be in condition to fully appreciate the arguments.

I hope that the minority leader would in due course recognize that since the bill is going to be voted on in any event, that we could consider more amendments if we did shorten the time limit on each amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. BAKER. I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I will certainly reconsider the situation and attempt to determine how many amendments are going to be offered on this side of the aisle. I feel that I voice the sentiment of all the Senators on this side of the aisle when I say that the inclusion of title IV in this bill is a prostitution—a prostitution—of the budget process. We do not think it is a reconciliation bill because of the violation of rule XV. If it is not a reconciliation bill, of course, it is not covered by a time limit or by the germaneness provision.

I am not going to raise that point at this juncture. I may not raise it at any juncture on this bill, but this practice ought to stop, and I am going to try to find a way, if there can possibly be one found, in the future to make a point of order against the whole bill when it comes out to the floor with legislation that comes under the jurisdiction of other committees, which is a clear violation of paragraph 5 of rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

I will take into consideration the request of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished manager of the bill. I just want to voice discontent and strong feeling about this bill and the fact that title IV is a clear violation of rule XV.

Now, there is no way we can get around it. We can make a point of order against title IV now, and the point of order would knock out title IV, but the rule was circumvented by amending title III the other day.

The intent of the rule has already been circumvented; the language of the Packwood amendment is in the bill, and it is of no practical benefit to knock out title IV now. That was what I sought to prevent with my recommital motion earlier this week.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. STENNIS. I did not get the Senator's request when he said it would be 4 o'clock. Was that relating to some time limitation for amendments?

Mr. BAKER. Yes. Mr. President, I say to my friend from Mississippi that it would be my hope that since we need to finish this bill tonight, we might further reduce the time available on other amendments with the exception of the amendment dealing with interest and dividend withholding to 30 minutes equally divided.

The minority leader indicated that he had not yet run that through his clearance process, and I indicated I would make the request again at 4 o'clock.

Mr. STENNIS. I certainly want to cooperate and I will as far as I can. There is a matter here, though on which I have avoided taking any time from other parts of the bill because of the importance of this matter, the revenue bonds, I would be willing to agree to a time except on that one. I am supporting the revenue bond provision. I want to be sure, however, I do not waive any rights there but will on other matters.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator most assuredly has not waived any rights, and I will take account of that when I repropound the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. The Chair asks that the Senators who are conversing please remove themselves to the cloakroom.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry. How much time is remaining on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the present time the majority leader has 3 hours and 2 minutes, the minority leader has 3 hours and 24 minutes.

Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I might say that as far as I know now there may be other amendments that have not been called to our attention, but I only know of about 9 or 10 amendments. There are others that we can dispose of, I am certain, that have not been called to our attention and which are technical in nature. If in fact there is no revenue loss and if in fact there is no objection from the Treasury and they have been cleared on both sides, we may be able to accept those amendments. That could happen fairly quickly.

The other amendments, I assume, would take at least 30 minutes each, and I assume the withholding amendment would take up to an hour.

I think we are making good progress. I am sorry everybody cannot be first. I say to some of those who may not understand that we are going to be able to accommodate some people who have problems; just let us get through the withholding vote. We have to have a little patience in this body. If we lose the withholding vote, it will all be over anyway.

I say to my friends and those who are not my friends, just let us try to work it out. We are doing the best we can to accommodate every Senator—every Senator.

Mr. ARMSTRONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At this point it will take unanimous consent since there are 13 minutes left on the first committee amendment of the Senator from Kansas and 11 of the Senator from Louisiana.

Who yields time? If neither side yields time——

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum not charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised that the quorum call that has been in progress was not charged against the total time. I have no objection to the quorum call, but I do object to not charging it.

We have 6 hours yet to go, and time is wasting. Even if we did not have any votes that would be 10 p.m. tonight before we finish.

So I hope in the future Members will not ask that quorum calls not be charged against the time because otherwise they will be charged and they should be charged, and if I am in the Chamber I will object to that request.

Mr. President, I indicated earlier that at 4 o'clock or thereabouts I hoped to renew my request of a shorter time limitation on amendments. I am advised by the minority leader they have not yet completed their clearance process, but I continue to hope we will be able to do that.

Mr. President, on the matter at hand I understand no amendment is pending, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first committee amendment is pending.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, other than the committee amendment.

Mr. President, I hope Members now will take account of the fact we have got to finish this bill and we are either going to finish it tonight or do it in the morning. I intend to ask the Senate to stay until approximately 12 o'clock tonight, but if we have not finished by then, we already have an order for the Senate to convene at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning, and we will work on it on Friday until we do finish. But it is possible to finish it tonight, and I would urge Senators to get on with the business at hand.

Mr. President, I now yield the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment on which there are 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Senator from Colorado to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Colorado.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1117

(Purpose: To provide for the indexing of the basis of certain capital assets)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1117.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 501, line 8, insert "; INDEXATION OF BASIS OF CAPITAL ASSETS" after "ASSETS".

On page 504, after line 24, insert the following:

SEC. 310A. INDEXING OF CERTAIN ASSETS FOR PURPOSES OF DETERMINING GAIN OR LOSS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part II of subchapter O of chapter 1 (relating to basis rules of general application) is amended by inserting after section 1019 the following new section:

"SEC. 1020. INDEXING OF CERTAIN ASSETS FOR PURPOSES OF DETERMINING GAIN OR LOSS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—

"(1) INDEXED BASIS SUBSTITUTES FOR ADJUSTED BASIS.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), if an indexed asset which has been held for more than 1 year is sold or otherwise disposed of, for purposes of this title the indexed basis of the asset shall be substituted for its adjusted basis.

"(2) EXCEPTION FOR DEPRECIATION, ETC.—The deduction for depreciation, depletion, and amortization shall be determined without regard to the application of paragraph (1) to the taxpayer or any other person.

"(b) INDEXED ASSET.—

"(2) CERTAIN PROPERTY EXCLUDED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'indexed asset' does not include—

"(C) NET LEASE PROPERTY.—In the case of a lessor, net lease property (within the meaning of subsection (h)(1)).

"(D) CERTAIN PREFERRED STOCK.—Stock which is fixed and preferred as to dividends and does not participate in corporate growth to any significant extent.

"(E) STOCK IN CERTAIN CORPORATIONS.—Stock in—

"(iii) a foreign corporation.

"(3) EXCEPTION FOR STOCK IN FOREIGN CORPORATION WHICH IS REGULARLY TRACED ON NATIONAL OR REGIONAL EXCHANGE.—Clause (iii) of paragraph (2)(F) shall not apply to stock in a foreign corporation the stock of which is listed on the New York Stock Exchange, the American Stock Exchange, or any domestic regional exchange for which quotations are published on a regular basis other than—

"(A) stock of a foreign investment company (within the meaning of section 1246(b)), and

"(B) stock in a foreign corporation held by a United States person who meets the requirements of section 1248(a)(2).

"(C) INDEXED BASIS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) INDEXED BASIS.—The indexed basis for any asset is—

"(A) the adjusted basis of the asset, multiplied by

"(B) the applicable inflation ratio.

"(2) APPLICABLE INFLATION RATIO.—The applicable inflation ratio for any asset is the percentage arrived at by dividing—

"(A) the gross national product deflator for the calendar quarter in which the disposition takes place, by

"(B) the gross national product deflator for the calendar quarter in which the asset was acquired by the taxpayer (or, if later, the calendar quarter ending December 31, 1984).

The applicable inflation ratio shall not be taken into account unless it is greater than 1. The applicable inflation ratio for any asset shall be rounded to the nearest ⅒ of 1 percent.

"(3) GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT DEFLATOR.—The gross national product deflator for any calendar quarter is the implicit price deflator for the gross national product for such quarter (as shown in the first revision thereof.)

"(d) SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) TREATMENT AS SEPARATE ASSET.—In the case of any asset, the following shall be treated as a separate asset:

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The applicable inflation ratio shall be appropriately reduced for calendar months at any time during which the asset was not an indexed asset.

"(B) CERTAIN SHORT SALES.—For purposes of applying subparagraph (A), an asset shall be treated as not an indexed asset for any short sale period during which the taxpayer or the taxpayer's spouse sells short property substantially identical to the asset. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the short sale period begins on the day after the substantially identical property is sold and ends on the closing date for the sale.

"(3) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN DISTRIBUTIONS.—A distribution with respect to stock in a corporation which is not a dividend shall be treated as a disposition.

"(4) SECTION CANNOT INCREASE ORDINARY LOSS.—To the extent that (but for this paragraph) this section would create or increase a net ordinary loss to which the second sentence of section 1231(a) applies or an ordinary loss to which any other provision of this title applies, such provision shall not apply. The taxpayer shall be treated as having a long-term capital loss in an amount equal to the amount of the ordinary loss to which the preceding sentence applies.

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part II of subchapter O of such chapter 1 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 1019 the following new item:

"Sec. 1020. Indexing of certain assets for purposes of determining gain or loss."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales and exchanges after December 31, 1984.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The purpose of the amendment is very simple. It is to index the basis computation in the capital gains tax. Under current law the capital gains tax is applied on the increased portion of the value of an asset prior to its sale. While assets held for several years usually increase in value, in many instances the increase is a fictional, a paper, gain. It is an inflation gain rather than a real gain in purchasing power or value. In other words, in its present form the capital gains tax now imposes not a tax on profit or gain or income but merely a tax on inflation, and it amounts to a most unfair levy on capital.

My amendment removes the inflation tax by permitting taxpayers to adjust the basis of certain assets for inflation using the GNP deflator. The inflation adjustment is the percent of increase in inflation as measured by the GNP deflator from the time of the purchase of the asset or the effective date of legislation until the time the asset is sold. As a result, the capital gains tax will apply only to real gain and not to the inflation gain.

To reduce the complexity that might otherwise result, my amendment applies only to the corporate stock and real/personal property that has been sold or exchanged, and does not apply for purposes of determining depreciation, cost depletion or amortization. The debt is completely excluded from the inflation adjustment. The inflation adjustment can be used to index assets for determining corporate earnings and profits.

I point out to my colleagues that the amendment which I propose is essentially identical to legislation which has been previously adopted by the other body during the 95th Congress. Despite the amendment's popularity and commonsense it was not taken up at that time by the Senate, although in principle the issue had been discussed by the Senate and the Senate Committee on Finance.

Mr. President, in support of the amendment I wish to make two points: First, this amendment corrects a serious impairment in the capital formation process which is so necessary to get the economy moving again. The National Bureau of Economic Research reported in 1 recent year, in 1 year, there occurred $4 billion in capital gains transactions which were subject to capital gains taxes of $1.1 billion. However, this was inflation-gain taxed, and if there had been an inflation adjustment as proposed by my amendment in fact the capital losses would have exceeded $1 billion. In other words, the current capital gains tax prevents the sale and exchange of property and the subsequent freeing up of capital for other investment.

We have put a provision in the Tax Code which inadvertently freezes people into marginal or unproductive investments. So the first reason to be in favor of this is because it will improve the marginal efficiency of the entire economy.

It is for that reason, I am sure, that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the U.S. Industrial Council, among others, have endorsed this amendment.

Mr. President, there is another more direct and more personal reason why every taxpayer has stake in the passage of this amendment, and it is simply one of equity.

It is not fair, my friends, just as matter of basic fairness it is wrong, to tax somebody on a gain which has not occurred. Let me give you a very specific example. Let us suppose smeone bought a house for, say, $20,000 10 year ago. Do not laugh because 10 years ago you could buy a pretty good house for $20,000. Let us suppose also during the last 10 years the value of that house increased 106 percent in nominal dollars, and then you sold the house.

Under the present law you would have a large capital gain. In fact, you would have the capital gain on about $21,000 to pay, In fact, there has been no real increase in value, no increase in purchasing power, only, as one of my colleagues described it, a depreciation in value of money because in the last decade the GNP deflator has increased 106 percent.

What I am trying to avoid in the future is taxing people on a paper gain, an unreal gain, an inflation gain.

I mentioned the last decade but, of course, many people have owned assets for longer than a decade; and speaking about houses, I cannot help recalling the story my father told about the house in which he lived as a boy and a young man which was built by my grandparents around the turn of the century, and we believe, although there are no actual records of that particular house, which is no longer owned by our family, that house was actually built for around $500.

It was subsequently improved, and we think the total investment in it was perhaps $1,500. Were that house to be sold today we estimate it would sell for around $75,000. The house has changed hands a number of times in the 75 or 80 years since it was built, but in many instances people do own houses, farms, small businesses which have been in the families for long periods of time.

The question I put to my colleagues is, Is it fair to put a heavy tax, indeed a tax virtually on the entire value of these properties, at the time they are sold when the real runup in the nominal value results almost entirely from inflation? I think the answer to that very clearly is that it is not fair to do so.

Mr. President, I wish I could go back and index things back to 1900 or 1940 or 1960 to take care of all of the people who are already frozen into these investments. But, in candor, I must say that my amendment does not do so. My amendment does not go into effect until January 1, 1985, and the indexing process only begins in 1985. It does not take care of the past, but at least it does say in the future, starting 2 years hence, we will not further tax inflation gains.

Finally, Mr. President, before I yield the floor, let me point out, because the effective date is 2 years hence, there will be little or no impact on revenues during the crucial period of the next 3 years. In fact, it is my belief there will be no impact. There may be an inconsequential impact in 1985 but, in essence, there will be no revenue impact, and so we would not be affecting the reconciliation targets contained in the pending bill.

Mr. President, with that word of explanation, I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have an amendment from the Senator from Colorado pending. Does anyone yield time?

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. There are 30 minutes remaining to the manager of the bill and 23 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it be charged equally against both sides of the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is the Senator saying it is charged against both sides of the amendment?

Mr. BRADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wonder if we could charge it against the bill, because if it were prolonged the effect would be to shut me out from speaking again.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have no objection. I ask unanimous consent that it be charged equally against both sides on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado would index capital gains for inflation beginning in 1985. As a result of the effective date, there would be very little revenue lost through the 1983–85 period. So I assume it would not have any impact on the overall numbers.

The Senator from Colorado offered a similar amendment in the Finance Committee but it would have been effective January 1, 1983. Is that not correct?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. This would take effect the same time that general indexing takes effect, tax indexing, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado in the tax bill last year.

I agree we would be concerned about taxing a so-called gain that is nothing more than inflation. However, I think I should point our for the record—and perhaps the Senator from Colorado did so while the Senator from Kansas was off the floor—that capital gains already receive favorable treatment under the Tax Code. Only 40 percent of the capital gains are subject to tax. The exclusion of 60 percent of capital gains is partially intended to compensate for the problem the Senator is attempting to address.

The long-run solution to this problem is to reduce substantially the rate of inflation. Of course, we made substantial progress toward this goal. Successful passage of this legislation—I am talking about the overall legislation—in my view would get us on the road to stabilize inflation and hopefully a recognition in the financial markets that we are serious about what we do in the Congress of the United States.

I have no strong objection to the amendment, because it appears to be largely revenue neutral. But I understand the amendment may not be germane. Does the Senator from New Jersey wish to speak to the amendment?

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Colorado that it is my understanding that this does add new material to the bill and, therefore, it is not germane. I have not decided at this point if I would make a point of order. But the amendment was rejected in the Finance Committee. So what I will do is suggest the absence of a quorum and maybe we can discuss it, unless the Senator would like to do otherwise.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, rather than have a quorum call while that amendment is under discussion, perhaps we could take care of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Alaska, which has been cleared, I understand, on both sides of the aisle, and which involves little, if any, cost and has been cleared by Treasury. Is that correct?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. That is correct.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily set aside the Armstrong amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1118

(Purpose: clarify that oil produced by wholly-owned subsidiaries of Alaska Native corporations constitutes exempt Indian oil for purposes of the crude oil windfall profit tax)

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1118.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. With objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 468, after line 6, at the end of subtitle G of title II, insert the following new section:

"ALASKA NATIVE CORPORATIONS

"SEC. Paragraph (2) of subsection (d) of section 4994 of subpart B of chapter 45 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to windfall profit tax on domestic crude oil; categories of oil) is amended by striking "under" the first time it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "pursuant to".".

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, this amendment is technical in nature and has no revenue impact that I can determine. This has been cleared with the Treasury Department.

In the windfall profits tax legislation passed several years ago, there was created an exemption for oil produced by or for the benefit of an Indian tribe or tribal organization which satisfies the conditions of the act. It specifically included crude oil produced by a native corporation organized under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and produced before 1992.

At least one of our Native corporations in Alaska has established a wholly owned subsidiary to conduct business operations and to separate their activities from the other diverse missions of the parent corporation—such as education, health care and other social welfare duties. It is their contention, one I agree with, that such a subsidiary should also be exempt from the windfall profits tax, since all the benefits of the subsidiary flow to the Native Americans for whom the exemption was created.

In trying to plan for their future, the corporation has urged the Internal Revenue Service to agree formally that the wholly owned subsidairy will be treated in such a manner. But this effort, over a period of years, has been unsuccessful, and hence the need for this small change in the act to make it clear that Congress does consider such an arrangement to be within the spirit and letter of the law.

If the Native corporation does not secure the necessary approval, they will be forced to disband their subsidiary and bring the oil production business back under the parent corporation, incurring considerable expense and inconvenience in the process.

Mr. President, all benefits of the subsidiary, as I have indicated, would continue to flow to Native Americans, the group that the Congress intended to benefit by the original exemption. It seems clear to me that this provision should be adopted in order to allow Native corporations to handle their business affairs in an orderly and organized manner.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an explanation of the amendment, which would make it clear that the benefit of the Indian exemption would be extended to the wholly owned subsidiary only, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY THAT OIL PRODUCED BY SUBSIDIARIES OF ALASKA NATIVE CORPORATIONS ORGANIZED UNDER THE ALASKA NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT CONSTITUTES "EXEMPT INDIAN OIL" FOR PURPOSES OF THE WINDFALL PROFIT TAX

PRESENT LAW

Crude oil produced prior to 1992 by a Native corporation organized under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act ("ANCSA"), 43 U.S.C. §§ 1601 et seq., from mineral interests received and held by the corporation under the Act is exempt from the crude oil windfall profit tax. This exemption is part of the "exempt Indian oil" provision (I.R.C. Sec. 4994(d)) of the Crude Oil Windfall Profit Tax Act of 1980 ("COWPTA"), 26 U.S.C. Secs. 4986 et seq. ANCSA, enacted in 1971 to settle the aboriginal land claims of Alaska Natives, provided for the establishment of Native regional and village corporations, with the stock to be held by Alaska Natives and to remain inalienable until December 18, 1991. The settlement involved more than 40 million acres of land and approximately $950 million. The regional corporations received the mineral rights to all land transferred under ANCSA, and the minerals subject to these rights were expected to serve as sources of additional funds to implement the settlement. The exemption for oil produced from these mineral rights by the corporations, added to the exempt Indian oil provision of COWPTA as a Senate floor amendment and modified in conference, had as its principal purpose the treatment of Alaska Natives, the beneficial owners of the ANCSA Native corporations, in a manner similar to other American Indians under COWPTA.

REASONS FOR CHANGE

The exemption from the crude oil windfall profit tax affects the Native regional corporations which were organized, and received the mineral rights transferred, under ANCSA. These regional corporations have developed or purchased business interests in a wide range of activities, many of which are unrelated to the corporations' resource base. In addition, reflecting their origin as vehicles for implementing a settlement of Indian land claims, these corporations are engaged in a variety of educational, social-welfare, and other service activities for the Native community—activities which are not ordinarily conducted by business corporations. From the outset, these corporations were counselled by their business and legal advisors to establish separate, wholly-owned subsidaries for their various business activities. One reason was to segregate the management of the individual business activities of the subsidiaries from the unusually diverse missions of the parent corporations. The second reason was to limit the liability of the parent corporations, given the substantial liabilities which can be generated by a number of the businesses, particularly the mineral extraction businesses, to be managed by the subsidiaries.

Under the existing exemption, the question arises whether oil (other than oil which meets the definition of exempt Alaskan oil under I.R.C. Sec. 4994(e)) produced by a wholly-owned subsidiary of a Native regional corporation qualifies for the crude oil windfall profit tax exemption. This amendment clarifies this issue by specifically extending the exemption to such subsidiaries. The extension is justified for several reasons. First it permits the regional corporations to continue to conduct their affairs through wholly-owned subsidiaries for sound reasons which are largely unrelated to tax consequences and are fully consistent with the purposes of ANCSA. Second, as the benefits received by Alaska Natives from the oil produced are not diminished or otherwise altered by the shift of production responsibilities from regional corporations to their wholly-owned subsidiaries, the Congressional intent in enacting the exemption is implemented, and its possible frustration avoided, by the amendment. Third, the amendment has no revenue effect and involves no potential for tax abuse.

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT

This amendment clarifies that, not only each Native corporation organized under ANCSA, but also any wholly-owned subsidiary of such a corporation, would be eligible for the crude oil windfall profit tax exemption if the other requirements of I.R.C. Sec. 4994(d)(2) are met: (1) the oil is produced by the corporation (or its subsidiary); (2) the oil is produced from mineral interests received under the Act and held by the corporation; (or its subsidiary); and (3) production occurs before 1992.

EFFECTIVE DATE

This amendment is effective on enactment.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, again, this would have no effect on revenues. It has been approved by the Treasury and cleared with the floor manager, the Senator from Kansas, and the minority manager, the Senator Louisiana.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment. I understand it has been cleared with Senator LONG. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI).

The amendment (UP No. 1118) was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1117

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the yeas and nays will be asked for on the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

TAXPAYER PROTECTION

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor Mr. ARMSTRONG'S taxpayer protection amendment. If this section of H.R. 4961 had not been changed, taxpayers and those providing advice in the preparation of tax returns would be placed in serious jeopardy when filing returns that merely take advantage of available tax law.

There is no question that taxpayers should not be allowed to take unsupported positions and those that do, should be assessed all applicable penalties. However, to place taxpayers and preparers in a position of deciding, prior to filing that they were "more likely than not" to prevail is obviously unreasonable. For example, tax courts frequently take years to reach a decision on an individual item.

Perhaps Mr. President, as we move toward a more simplified tax system the current situation will not persist, but today it does. Therefore, Americans who take advantage of current tax law believing there is substantial authority for their actions should not be subject to additional penalties if for some reason they are subsequently overruled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I have some time remaining. I only wish to thank my colleague from Kansas for his observations. As the father of indexing, his remarks on this are very pertinent. I thank him for it.

And I thank my colleague from New Jersey for his forbearance on the point of order. I believe the amendment is completely germane but he could certainly raise a point of order and I thank him for his forbearance.

I urge my colleagues to support the amendment. Unless there is something further, I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) would vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. ARMSTRONG'S amendment (UP No. 1117) was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, just a moment. Under the rule on this bill, there is 1 hour debate on a motion to reconsider; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. Now, the Chair has recognized me, so I move to reconsider, and I now intend to debate this matter.

Mr. President, I had intended to offer an amendment concerning capital gains tax. Considering this vote, and discretion being the better part of valor, I will not offer it because it would not have a chance to prevail. Yet, my colleagues should know that this vote cannot under any stretch of the imagination be considered compatible with a zeal for the constitutional amendment to balance the budget; it cannot be compatible with a concern for the stability of the economy; it cannot be compatible with a concern about what we call true investments as opposed to speculative investments, and it certainly does not comport with commonsense or fiscal responsibility.

Consider a brief history of the capital gains tax in this country. We first adopted the capital gains preference in this country in 1921. We had a 2-year holding period in order to qualify for the benefit of a capital gains rate. We have tinkered around with it, but from 1942 to 1978, the law has basically allowed a 50-percent deduction on the sale of an asset provided it was held——

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate so the Senator can be heard?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BUMPERS. From 1942 to 1978, the law required that taxpayers hold an asset for 6 months in order to qualify for the 50-percent deduction. Later on, we adopted a minimum tax; for a time, the maximum tax was 25 percent, but for several years, the maximum tax on capital gains was 49 percent.

I am a victim of that maximum. I sold an asset I held for 3 or 4 years, and I paid 49 percent on it. It was virtually all gain.

In 1978, the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. Hansen, who no longer is a Member of this body, lobbied this body long and hard to get the capital gains rate changed, and he succeeded. He got 57 votes, as I remember, as cosponsors to reduce the capital gains maximum rate from 49 percent to 28 percent. That took effect in 1978.

In 1981, under the "guaranteed depression tax bill," we reduced that rate still further to 20 percent.

Now, there is one item I forgot, and that is that when Senator Hansen got this body to accept the change in rate from 49 percent to 28 percent, in exchange for changing the capital gains holding period to 1 year. So we moved the time from 6 months to 1 year in exchange for reducing the rate from 49 percent to 28 percent. Then last year, just 3 years after that tax went into effect, we reduced it to 20 percent. Today, if you buy stock for $10,000 and you double your money in 1 year and you make $10,000 profit, the maximum tax you pay on that is $2,000. If you sell it 1 month short of a year and you are in the $50,000 or over income category, you are going to pay 50 percent.

Now, Senators, is that not a pretty good incentive? I bet you there are not 10 Members of this body who do not now hold an asset just waiting for 1 year to expire. What is the genesis of this? What is the rationale for the capital gains tax? It is to encourage people to invest their money in true investment.

Now, if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, there is absolutely no such incentive. If you buy property under that amendment and the CPI goes up 10 percent, and if your stock has not gone up 10 percent, you lose money. But if it goes up 10 percent, you are home free; you have had a 10-percent gain tax free.

The Senator from Colorado will reply, "Well, is that not fair? If the inflation rate is 10 percent, why should it not be tax free?"

Well, that risk is what makes the mare go round in this country. People do not invest their money just hoping to recapture the inflation rate. They invest their money hoping to make an appreciable gain.

What would happen to the stock markets, incidentally, if we had a 6-month limitation on gains on stock?

Recently, the stock market dropped about 30 points in 1 day. If there was no incentive for people to hold on to their stock in this time, in this economic climate, the stock market would go crazy.

Did you know that in 1983, the year coming up, the U.S. Treasury will lose $23 billion to capital gains? Twenty-three billion dollars in 1983. Twenty-six billion dollars in 1984. Twenty-nine billion dollars in 1985. That is the difference between what people pay under a capital gains rate and what they would pay if they were paying taxes on ordinary income.

Is that not a gravy train? How can anyone talk about balancing the budget and give the U.S. Treasury away at the same time? How can you talk about fairness when 55 percent of all the capital gains in this country goes to the people who make more than $30,000 a year?

How can you stand here, in the name of fairness, and say that you believe in all this when 26 percent of all the capital gains in this country goes to the wealthiest 4 percent of people of this country?

That is who this amendment takes care of. I do not have anything against rich people. I have been trying to join them all my life. [Laughter.] But they should pay a fair amount of taxes.

You have three options on capital gains. One would be to abolish it and make no distinction. If people make money on a fast trade, let them pay the ordinary rate on it.

Some people say there should be a distinction, that if you buy a capital asset today and sell it tomorrow, you should get the gains rate so long as it is a capital asset. I do not agree with that. A third option is to allow a distinction, but require a holding period.

What we are doing here is cutting the time back as we index under the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. That is giving away the store. It encourages wild speculation. As long as inflation is there, you have no chance to lose. If your asset is not making more than inflation, dispose of it. That is what a prudent businessman does, anyway.

While Senators have listened to me, they saved themselves from listening to my amendment to restore the 1-year requirement. If this vote is indicative of anything, it tells me, and prudence tells me, that I should not offer my amendment and take up the time of the Senate with it. So I am not going to do so. However, I wanted to say these things, and I wanted an up-or-down vote, on this motion to reconsider.

I had to vote "yes" in order to get the floor, to move to reconsider, and I certainly want to be recorded as "no" on this. So I am going to ask for the yeas and nays in a moment, but I will be happy to yield the floor for the time being, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kansas control the time in opposition to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). The Senator is correct.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wonder if the Senator will yield to me.

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr President, while it is the privilege of the Senator from Arkansas to oppose the amendment we have just adopted, I think his explanation of it exceeds the reality of the amendment we have adopted.

I wish to note, in passing, that the 6-month gain period amendment, to which the Senator from Arkansas is very much opposed and which the Senator from Colorado favors, is not the subject of the amendment we have just passed. It is not contained in the indexing amendment. It is a separate issue.

Second, Mr. President, having stated my own views about the desirability and need of indexing the capital gains system, I am reluctant to restate my own arguments. Rather than doing that, I want to quote from three authorities who have looked into this subject, in which they succinctly explain the reason why the amendment we have adopted is a tougher one.

First, I quote from the 1978 report of the House Ways and Means Committee, the report which accompanied legislation which went to the House at the time an amendment of virtually the same form was adopted by the House.

Before I read this, I ask the Chair to call the Senate to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's point is well taken. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I invite the attention of my colleagues to this brief explanation from the House committee report: "Reason for change:"

Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please come to order. Those Senators wishing to converse will retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, let me quote in full the brief paragraph of explanation from the House committee report which sums up succinctly why this amendment is well justified:

The substantial inflation which our country has experienced over the past decade and is likely to face in the near future has produced serious problems with the present law taxation of gains from the sale of assets held for long periods of time. Because a taxpayer's basis for tax purposes is determined by historical cost, a taxpayer can have substantial gains for tax purposes even though the real value of the assets (i.e., adjusted for inflation) has not increased. Even though the tax treatment of capital gains is modified significantly by other provisions of this bill, gains which reflect only inflationary increases in value would nonetheless remain subject to tax in many cases. Moreover, in many instances individuals with the same marginal tax rate may have an equal amount of real gain taxed at a different rate due to the combination of inflationary pressures and the length of their holding period for the asset. For these reasons, bill includes a provision for inflation adjustments to a taxpayer's basis in certain assets for purposes of determining any gain on the sale or exchange of that type of asset.

Mr. President, for those who have just entered the Chamber or who may have just tuned in, what I have just quoted is the explanation of the indexing provision which was contained in the House committee report prior to the time the House adopted a virtually idential amendment.

I also wish to call attention to an explanation of the reason and the justice and the fairness of this amendment which was contained in an article published in the Wall Street Journal on July 27, 1978, by the distinguished economist Martin Feldstein, which makes the same point. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 27, 1978]

INFLATION AND CAPITAL FORMATION

(By Martin Feldstein)

During the past decade, effective tax rates have increased dramatically on capital gains, on interest income and on the direct returns to investment in plant and equipment. Investors in stocks and bonds now pay tax rates of nearly 100 percent—and in many cases more than 100 percent—on their real returns.

This change has taken place without public debate and without legislative action, though Tuesday's vote by the House Ways and Means Committee to "index" capital gains may finally have placed the matter on the political agenda. Our tax system was designed for an economy with little or no inflation. But if current rates of inflation persist, the existing tax laws will continue to impose effective tax rates of more than 100 percent on investment incomes. To make matters even worse, the current tax laws imply that future tax rates will depend haphazardly on future rates of inflation and therefore cannot be predicted at the time that investment decisions are being made.

These extremely high tax rates and the uncertainty about future tax rates are a cloud that hangs over both the stock market and business investment decisions. Several recent studies at the National Bureau of Economic Research that quantify the effect of inflation on the taxation of investment income and therefore on the incentive to investment show these dramatic effects.

A SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE

Inflation is particularly harsh on the taxation of capital gains. Under current law, when corporate stock or any other asset is sold, a capital gains tax must be paid on the entire difference between the selling price and the original cost even though much of the nominal gain only offsets a general rise in the prices of consumer goods and services. Taxing nominal gains in this way very substantially increases the effective tax rate on real price-adjusted gains. Indeed, many individuals pay a substantial capital gains tax even though, when adjustment is made for the change in the price level, they actually receive less from their sale than they had originally paid.

In a recent study at the National Bureau of Economic Research, Joel Slemrod and I measured the total excess taxation of corporate stock capital gains caused by inflation and the extent to which this distortion differs capriciously among individuals. We found that in 1973 individuals paid capital gains tax on $4.6 billion of nominal capital gains on corporate stock. When the costs of these shares are adjusted for the increase in the consumer price level since they were purchased, this gain becomes a loss of nearly $1 billion.

The $4.6 billion of nominal capital gains resulted in a tax liability of $1.1 billion. The tax liability on the real capital gains would have been only $361 million. Inflation thus raised tax liabilities by nearly $500 million, approximately doubling the overall effective tax rate on corporate stock capital gains.

Although adjusting for the price change reduces the gain at every income level, the effect of the price level correction is far from uniform. In particular, the mismeasurement of capital gains is most severe for taxpayers with incomes under $100,000.

In the highest income class, there is little difference between nominal and real capital gains; in contrast, taxpayers with incomes below $100,000 suffered real capital losses even though they were taxed on positive nominal gains. In each income class up to $50,000, recognizing real capital gains makes the tax liability negative. At higher income levels, tax liabilities are reduced but remain positive on average; the extent of the current excess tax decreases with income.

Inflation not only raises the effective tax rate, but also makes the taxation of capital gains arbitrary and capricious. Individuals who face the same statutory rates have their real capital gains taxed at very different rates because of differences in holding periods. For example, among taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of $20,000 to $50,000, we found that only half of the tax liability on capital gains was incurred by taxpayers whose liabilities on real gains would have been between 80 percent and 100 percent of their actual liabilities. The remaining half of tax liabilities were incurred by individuals whose liabilities on real gains would have been less than 80 percent of their actual statutory liabilities.

In short, our study showed that inflation has substantially increased—roughly doubled—the overall effective tax rate on corporate stock capital gains. Although this estimate relates to 1973 (because that is the only year for which data of this type are available), the continuing high rate of inflation means that the tax distortion for more recent years is likely to be even greater.

The second major problem that inflation causes in our tax system is in the treatment of depreciation. Under current law, the amount of depreciation that is allowed on any asset depends on its original cost. When inflation raises the price level, the real value of these depreciation allowances is reduced. This reduction in the real value of depreciation that is caused by the historic cost method of depreciation is equivalent to a substantial increase in the rate of tax on corporate and other investment income.

In 1977, the historic cost method of tax depreciation caused corporate depreciation to be understated by more than $30 billion. This understatement increased corporate tax liabilities by $15 billion, a 25 percent increase in corporate taxes. This extra inflation tax reduced net profits by 28 percent of the total 1977 net profits of $53 billion. This is the single most important adverse effect of inflation on capital formation.

This brings me to the final tax problem caused by inflation, the failure to distinguish between nominal interest and real interest. This problem is fundamentally different from the problems involved in capital gains taxation and in depreciation. The nature of this difference is still not widely appreciated. The difference is extremely important, however, because it implies that changing the tax treatment of interest is less urgent than the other changes. Let me explain why.

It is clear that taxing nominal interest income imposes an unfair burden on bond owners and other lenders. But allowing a deduction for nominal interest expenses also provides an unfair benefit to corporations and other borrowers. When markets have had a chance to respond fully to the higher rate of inflation, interest rates will adjust to reduce the unfair burden on lenders and to reduce the unfair advantage of borrowers.

If all borrowers and lenders had the same marginal tax rate, the market adjustment of interest rates could eliminate all inequities, leaving borrowers and lenders with the same real after-tax rates of interest that they would face in the absence of inflation.

Let me emphasize, however, that this rough, long-run justice would only be achieved if the current method of depreciation is replaced by price-indexed or current cost depreciation. If we stay with our current system of depreciation, interest rates will fail to adjust fully and bondholders will suffer a substantial permanent fall in their real after-tax returns.

In a recent NBER study Lawrence Summers and I showed that, roughly speaking, with our current system of depreciation and taxation, each 1 percent rise in the expected rate of inflation will induce a 1 percent rise in the market rate of interest. The real rate of interest will remain unchanged, but the real after-tax rate of interest will fall sharply. This is, in effect, the mechanism by which firms transfer some of the adverse effect of historic cost depreciation to bondholders.

The magnitude of this effect is large enough to imply effective tax rates of more than 100 percent on interest income. Consider what has happened since the early 1960s. The inflation rate was then only 1 percent, and the 5 percent nominal yield of Baa bonds provided a real yield of 4 percent. An investor with a 40 percent marginal rate obtained an after-tax yield of 3 percent, and a real after-tax yield of 2 percent. By comparison, during the past three years a Baa bond yielded 10 percent, but consumer prices rose 6 percent. An investor with a 40 percent marginal rate obtained a 6 percent after-tax yield but a real after-tax yield of zero. In short the effect rate of tax on real income was 100 percent.

IMPERFECT BUT . . .

The meaning of this calculation is clear. If historic cost depreciation is continued, taxpaying bondholders will receive little or no after-tax income. This can be remedied by allowing bondholders and other lenders to include only real interest receipts in their taxable income. But this should be seen as only an imperfect way of dealing with the more basic problem of depreciation. Moreover, it is important to limit this change in the treatment of interest to bondholders; reducing the deduction taken by corporations to their real interest payments without adjusting depreciation rules would only transfer the full burden of mis-measuring depreciation to equity investors.

Replacing the current method of depreciation is, therefore, the key problem. If this is done, adjusting the taxation of interest income is of secondary importance. The specific method of depreciation that is adopted—replacement cost depreciation, general price indexing or immediate expensing of investment—is a much less important issue than the general principle that the value of depreciation must be insulated from the effects of inflation.●

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I also invite the attention of my colleagues to the observations of Donald T. Regan, who, at the time this article appeared in the May 21, 1978, issue of the New York Times, was the chairman and chief executive officer of Merrill, Lynch, Inc. He points out:

A recent study by two Harvard University researchers for the National Bureau of Economic Research concludes that our theoretical taxpayer is far from alone in losing money in real terms—partly because of inflation and partly because of the capital gains tax on the phantom profits he records when selling his investment. The study concludes that the $4.5 billion of nominal capital gains by individuals on corporate stock sold in 1973 becomes a real captial loss of nearly $1 billion when inflation is taken into account. And to add insult to injury, the study says the individuals paid nearly $500 million of capital gains taxes because of the distorting effect of inflation."

So, Mr. President, the only real issue here is the extent to which we should tax phantom gains, appreciations in nominal values which do not reflect the real value increase, the extent to which we are willing to tax only profits.

The amendment the Senate has adopted, and which I hope will not be reconsidered, is not a drastic amendment. It does not change the capital gains tax rates. It merely says that when a taxpayer computes his tax, he may first escalate his basis, the cost of acquisition of an asset, by the amount of change in the gross national product deflator from January 1, 1985, to the date of the sale.

I point out the 1985 date for two reasons; first, to make clear that there is no revenue effect during the reconciliation period; second, to make absolutely clear that this does not apply to any assets which may have held for long periods of time. It does not relate to any assets that are now in the hands of any person.

It is purely prospective, both in its computation and in its effective date.

So, Mr. President, unless there is more to be said, I think we are ready to go ahead to a vote and I certainly hope we will not reconsider.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, if the Senator will just yield, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 20 minutes and 30 seconds.

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield such time as the Senator from Nebraska may take.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair and thank my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senate will take another look at what it just did. I wish to advise the Chair and the Senate that this Senator is a cosponsor of the balanced budget amendment. The balanced budget amendment is designed to begin to address, a tiny step in the right direction, a major concern of the majority of Americans and supposedly a major concern of the 62 or 63 cosponsors that are a part of the balanced budget amendment.

Mr. President, I might be all wrong. But it seems inconsistent at best to this Senator that anyone who is cosponsoring a balanced budget amendment can simultaneously stand in the well and cast his vote to further reduce the income of the Federal Government even though it is set ahead 3 years until 1985.

I see this hypocrisy practiced time and time again on the floor of both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

What message are we sending? We are sending a message, it seems to me, that it is all right for us to posture here and promise someone that in 1985 we are going to give them a tax break.

Can there really be any question, Mr. President, that one of the main reasons for the difficulty that faces us today is the greatest spending and the highest deficits in our history, with further and further extension of the national debt which some people believe is a major concern for the ever high interest rates, the highest real interest rates in our history? And here we are supposedly in good conscience, supposedly informed, going to reduce the revenues of the Federal Government further in 1985?

I say to the sponsor or sponsors of this amendment or the some 60 Senators who voted for this amendment that I, too, would support it. I would be asking, if I could have the attention of the sponsor. The Senate is not in order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's point is well taken.

The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. EXON. I pose this question of the sponsor of the amendment, my friend and colleague from Colorado. Would he be willing to accept an amendment to the amendment that he has offered that said this amendment would go into effect in 1985 if by that time we have a balanced budget? If so, I would enthusiastically join him in support of this amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I would not be willing to accept such an amendment. I strongly favor the notion of a balanced budget at the earliest possible date, but I think that is unrelated really to the justice of this amendment.

Mr. EXON. With that explanation, Mr. President, I remain firmly opposed, therefore, and hope that the Senate will come to its senses and recognize that it just cast a vote that is not, is not, I emphasize, in truth and principle eliminating any chance for a balanced budget any time in the future.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am willing to let the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma to use some of his time if he wishes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to move onto other items, if we might. Perhaps we can accommodate the Senator from Arkansas getting another vote or however we want to proceed. We have just counted up—29 amendments, and we wish to move on to one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado would answer briefly: I am concerned about having, I guess, equity between investments. Presently we have people investing in banks, money market funds, bonds, and stocks certainly which would apply in this case, and real estate and others.

Would the Senator's amendment discriminate against people who are investing strictly for current income as compared to those who might be investing for either current income and capital gains? In other words, would the stock markets have an undue advantage now for investment as compared to banks and other types of investment?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I note first that as usual he has gone right to the heart of the matter, and in fact the amendment which the Senate has adopted restores an inequality which now exists.

The present law provides beginning in January 1985 for indexing the individual current income tax rates. That is the way that money market funds and savings account passbooks interest is taxed. We permit people to index their tax brackets for inflation.

We do not have any corresponding provision for capital gains which is the kind of situation that arises, say, for the sale of houses or farms or businesses, or other kinds of capital assets but that is what this amendment will do. The amendment we have passed. So, I believe that far from discriminating against any other kind of investment it simply provides the same kind of treatment for capital assets as we already have for ordinary income.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I take strong exception to the explanation the Senator from Colorado gave the Senator from Oklahoma. I consider him dead wrong.

In 1985 indexing is going to go into effect. Capital gains are not taxed separately. If you index capital gains and if your asset doubles in value over a 10-year period and you sell it, and, if during that same period of time the CPI has gone up 50 percent, you may make a gain of $5,000. For example, you make $10,000 over a 10-year period and the CPI has gone up $5,000. The taxable portion of that additional $5,000 is not going to be taxed at the 20-percent rate we have today. It is going to be taxed as ordinary income which is indexed according to the Senator's own amendment.

What we are doing here is double indexing capital gains. Make no mistake about that. That is exactly the way the tax form will be filled out.

The Senator from Colorado made a point a while ago as to why we have capital gains in the first place, and he is dead right. The capital gains rate was allowed so that income earned over a long period of time was not taxed all at once as though earned at once. Because of inflation, and because we want to encourage people to invest, we have in 3 years reduced the capital gains rate from 49 percent to 28 percent to 20 percent. Now this bill reduces holding period from 1 year to 6 months. What else can we do except to abolish it?

I go home and I hear people talk about that "tax and spend, tax and spend" Congress. That is deplorable. The only thing I know worse is cutting taxes and spending, cutting taxes and spending.

The 1982 budget submitted by the President was $33 billion higher than 1981, and the defense budget was $34 billion higher.

Therefore, except for the increase in defense spending, the budget in 1982 would have actually been $1 billion less than it was in 1981. And would that not be a happy day?

We cannot have it both ways. We cannot continue to vote for all that spending either and cut taxes the way we are cutting taxes under the Senator's amendment.

When his amendment is fully effective in today's dollars it will cost the U.S. Treasury between $2.5 billion and $3 billion. It would not be fully effective until the inflation rate reached 100 percent over what period that time was from 1985, but at that point you figure out how much money the Treasury would be losing if right now it was losing $2.5 billion.

I seriously object to this. I believe many thoughtful Senators will change their opinion on this proposal. Double indexing is something nobody ever dreamed we were doing, and yet that is what we are doing here.

Mr. President, unless somebody else wishes to speak I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. What would the Senator from Arkansas like us to do?

Mr. BUMPERS. I would like an up-or-down vote on the motion to reconsider, and if that fails that is it. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back on the motion?

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield back my time.

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 61, as follows:

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me briefly?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. I indicated earlier that I would like to see reduced time on the amendments that still remain. I am advised there are more than 20 still remaining, with just more than 6 hours of time remaining. In order to accommodate the maximum number of Senators and still try to finish this bill within the time provided by statute, I think that it is desirable that we should consider a reduction of time.

Therefore, at this time, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on the amendments remaining be limited to 30 minutes equally divided, with the exception of an amendment to be offered by the Senator from Wisconsin on interest and dividend withholding.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask the distinguished majority leader about the amendment to strike the 10-percent withholding. I believe that is by Mr. HOLLINGS and Mr. KASTEN. Is that the amendment to which the majority leader referred?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, that is the amendment to which I referred.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There is a second amendment by Mr. PRYOR dealing with tips that would have to be removed from the 30 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I exclude the interest and dividend withholding amendment as it may be offered and one related to tips as may be offered from the request for the limitation of 30 minutes each.

Mr. STENNIS. Will the Senator yield to me, Mr. President?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I have not used anything more than just a few minutes, 2 or 3 minutes' time, in this debate. But there will be one amendment offered by the Senator from New York in which I am vitally interested. That pertains to industrial revenue bonds. The bill proposes to terminate the program within 2 or 3 years. I want to try to get the body to strike that provision. We understand it will be gone into again later. They have gone into it some in the committee already. I would need a little more time than 30 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. I say to my friend from Mississippi that I fully understand his position and indeed I am sympathetic to his position. I might say that it is my understanding that certain parties who have a great concern in this respect, particularly the junior Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO) and the distinguished chairman of the committee, may have worked out a compromise that may or may not be acceptable to the Senator from Mississippi on this subject. But just to make sure that we do not unduly limit the opportunity for debate, I modify my request, Mr. President, to exclude any amendment that may be offered on revenue bonds.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. We will be happy to yield time from the bill.

Mr. STENNIS. It is just so that arrangements may be made for me to have 15 or 20 minutes. All of this originated in Mississippi in 1936.

Mr. BAKER. And it has spilled over a little into Tennessee.

Mr. STENNIS. Maybe it has spilled over a little, but it can be reformed.

Mr. KASTEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. As cosponsor of the amendment on withholding, I believe we would be willing to agree to a 1-hour time limit equally divided. If the Senator from South Carolina would agree to that, I believe 1 hour equally divided would be satisfactory.

As the author of the amendment on tips, I have no objection to a time limit on that amendment. It could be one-half hour equally divided, although there may be others who have objection to it that I do not know about. I have no objection to one-half hour equally divided on the amendment on tips.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, since the matter was identified by the minority leader, why do we not leave it as one of the exceptions, and I will say to my friend from Wisconsin I would like to make a further request later to reduce this item if we can clear it on the minority side and all around on both sides, of course.

Mr. President, to recap, it would be that any amendment would be limited to 30 minutes equally divided, except for one on interest and dividend withholding, one on tips, and one on industrial revenue bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to this request.

May I ask the distinguished majority leader if it could be agreed that votes would be stacked between 6:30 and 7:30 p.m. today?

Mr. BAKER. I do not mind that.

Mr. President, there are a number of Senators on the floor. I might put that question now, if any Member would be discommoded by the request of the minority leader, that between the hours of 6:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. that no rollcall votes which might be ordered would occur but would be stacked to occur following 7:30 p.m.

Mr. President, may I also say that under these circumstances if more than one vote is ordered, and I doubt that there would be between 6:30 and 7:30, I would be willing to shorten all the votes after the first vote. But let us leave that until the event.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY. Would it be possible to proceed with amendments where a rollcall vote is not necessary?

Mr. DOLE. I would have no objection to that. I think we can finish the whole bill by 7:30, but maybe not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the suggestion I made on stacking votes would in no way interfere with measures to be disposed of by a voice vote.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me say that next the Senator from Maine will be recognized, then the Senator from Ohio, then the Senator from Washington, and perhaps the Senator from Illinois for amendments that will be agreed to. We can dispose of them quickly.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1119

(Purpose: To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide targeted rate schedules to replace the across-the-board tax cuts enacted by the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1119.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert the following new section:

SEC. . TARGETED RATE REDUCTION.

(a) RATE REDUCTION.—Subsections (a) through (e) of section 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to tax imposed) are amended to read as follows:

"(a) MARRIED INDIVIDUALS FILING JOINT RETURNS AND SURVIVING SPOUSES.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every married individual (as defined in section 143) who makes a single return jointly with his spouse under section 6013, and every surviving spouse (as defined in section 2 (a)), a tax determined in accordance with the following tables:

"(1) FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1982.—

"If taxable income is:	The tax is:
Not over $3,400	No tax.
Over $3,400 but not over $5,500	11% of the excess over $3,400.
Over $5,500 but not over $7,600	$731, plus 14% of the excess over $5,500.
Over $7,600 but not over $11,900	$525, plus 16% of the excess over $7,600.

shall constitute prima facie evidence of the total number of all units of such class of products manufactured and produced in the United States in such period.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to the transitional rules covering safe harbor leases. This amendment has been agreed to by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee. I know of no objections. The amendment resolves a serious problem that the Finance Committee's reform of safe harbor leasing creates for a major employer in my State. Before I turn to a discussion of this amendment, however, I want to briefly address the issue of safe harbor leasing.

Last year, in an effort to address the unique capital requirements of depressed, critical industries—such as autos, steel and airlines—the Finance Committee created safe harbor leasing. This measure was less direct and more complicated than other proposals, such as refundable tax credits, but had merit—in the eyes of its creators—because it relied on the free market sale and exchange of assets and tax credits. In short, it kept the Government out of the capital allocation business.

Unfortunately, the lack of careful deliberation and the cunning of corporate lawyers combined to distort the intent and pervert the spirit of safe harbor leasing. Abuses of safe harbor leasing were spectacular and triggered a reaction that now threatens to literally emasculate this program. In the same hasty manner that Congress enacted this measure, it now seeks to destroy it. Just as the abuses of safe harbor serve as evidence of private greed, so do the manner and uneven results of last year's tax bill serve as testimony to the inadequacies of our tax policymaking process. For just as the enactment of safe harbor leasing brought a windfall of unintended benefits to profitable firms, so does its elimination carelessly jeopardize the survival of struggling, critical industries.

Safe harbor leasing was created for legitimate public policy concerns. Although accelerated depreciation and other business tax incentives contained in the Economic Recovery Act helped profitable firms meet their capital requirements, they do little to improve capital formation in our struggling basic industries. Safe harbor leasing addressed that problem by enabling unprofitable firms to sell unusable tax credits to finance badly needed investments. The capital formation problems of our basic industries that justified safe harbor leasing last year are even worse today. Continued high interest rates and a depressed economy have made new investments even more difficult for our basic industries. Their only opportunities to generate capital for plant modernization and job creation lie in the provisions of safe harbor leasing. Yet some in this body would eliminate those opportunities and damn the fate of our basic industries for the sins of their rich corporate cousins. In other words, they would have us throw the baby out with the bath water.

Mr. President, I want to express my appreciation to Senators DOLE and LONG for helping me prevent such unnecessary and unwarranted excess in a situation affecting the lives and well-being of my constituents. In the tax reform bill before us today, the Senate Finance Committee advances several modifications of safe harbor leasing to eliminate problems and cure abuses of the original statute. Unfortunately, the complex transitional rules in the committee's revision have created serious difficulties for a major employer in my State. This company, which is in a critical industry, acted in good faith in attempting to comply with the letter and spirit of the safe harbor provisions and now finds itself caught in a legislative crack.

In order to prevent an unnecessary injustice, I am offering an amendment—which has agreement on both sides of the aisle—to insure that the revised safe harbor provision as enacted and implemented will be fair and efficient.

The transition rules included in the committee bill permit property placed in service until July 1, 1983, to be covered by the old rules. But in order to qualify for this grace period, the committee proposal requires that the property be tied to a 7-month window period predating the committee's action.

The situation facing my constituents is one which the transitional rules evidently did not contemplate. This company's proposed lease agreement involves thousands of pieces of property which would require an analysis of as many as 15,000 documents to verify that the transitional rules are applicable. The property was placed in service before the committee took action and the bulk of the property would qualify under the bill's language.

It is impossible, however, to inventory the thousands of individual transactions connected with this property to determine which pieces fall within the 7-month window before the 90-day lease agreement period expires.

My amendment clearly insures that the committee's proposed transitional rules do not foreclose the safe harbor transaction with which this company is involved and gives special recognition to the legality of this transaction as part of the new tax bill.

Since the transaction in question must be completed by August 15, 1982, this amendment would have no substantial impact on revenues projected for fiscal years 1983 through 1985. For Ohio and Ohio citizens this amendment means jobs, productivity and an opportunity to continue to compete in the marketplace. It conforms the letter of safe harbor leasing reforms with the spirit of our endeavors to shape a fair and efficient tax policy. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, would the Senator from Ohio be good enough to explain the amendment a bit more?

Mr. GLENN. Yes; the transition rules were set up for a narrow time period for large corporations. One in particular that we are interested in, in Ohio, would be placed into a time box where they could not really take advantage of this bill as other companies could. They have some 15,000 subcontracts in the company, which takes a longer time period to put the package together. We have discussed this with the floor managers of the bill and they agreed that this time period for the company should be lengthened out.

Mr. METZENBAUM. What would be the revenue impact?

Mr. GLENN. They have estimated it was around $30 million in the original estimate—it would be $100 million over the whole period of this. That would be recovered in later years.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, would the floor manager yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Can the Senator from Kansas give us further elaboration on this transitional amendment of the Senator from Ohio? It is a $100 million impact. How many companies will be affected? I understand a company in Ohio will be affected. I am concerned about that but I would like to know its total impact.

Mr. DOLE. Let me say very quickly this is one of the many problems we are going to have during the course of the evening because of the changes made in the safe harbor leasing. We virtually cut that program in half in the Finance Committee.

We have American Motors and I think Ford Motor Co.—a lot of people will have a lot of problems. We hope to work them out.

As to American Motors and the safe harbor lease transition rules, on July 1, 1982, the Senate Finance Committee agreed to modify substantially the rules governing safe harbor leasing. American Motors Corp., along with many other major corporations, understood that property placed in service before the committee's action would be governed by the old rules. Instead, the transition rules included in the committee's bill permitted property placed in service until July 1, 1983, to be covered by the old rules. But in exchange for this 1-year grace period, the bill required the property to be tied to a 7-month window period predating the committee's action.

AMC is concerned with thousands of pieces of property involved in building the new AMC-Renault automobile, the Alliance. This property was placed in service before the committee's action, and much of it would fall within the window period set forth in the bill. But AMC will not be able to inventory this property to determine which individual pieces fall within this window period before the 90 days it has to lease the equipment expire. Moreover, its investment bankers have told it that buyers will not accept a warranty from AMC on this issue.

AMC believes that property placed in service before the committee's action should not be tied to any other dates predating such action. Only property relying on the 1-year grace period—if it survives—should be so tied. If this correction is not made, AMC will lose a large source of much-needed cash—cash which it had already factored in to its financed planning.,

We believe, after consulting with Treasury, that this is a reasonable amendment and should be agreed to.

I might say that, in conversation with the chairman of the board of this company, I learned it is a matter of virtually life and death for American Motors. So, through the efforts of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and others, we have been able to come to this agreement.

Mr. METZENBAUM. This Senator from Ohio is not questioning the need for the American Motors amendment. I just want to be certain that the window opening is not so broad that a number of other companies will go through it. Do I understand correctly that it is only one company? Is that the understanding?

Mr. DOLE. It is a very small window; yes, Mr. President.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have no objection.

Mr. GLENN. If there is no further discussion, I am glad to move to a vote.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Senator from Ohio in supporting this amendment.

The amendment is of vital importance to the people of Wisconsin, and paticularly Kenosha, Wisc. It will help to assure that the American Motors plant there will stay open and productive.

This amendment will provide the incentive needed to allow American Motors to finance their "Alliance" automobile. This new line of automobiles is critical to the continued employment of thousands of workers, both in Kenosha, and around the country.

An addition, Mr. President, this amendment does not alter the revenues to be gained from the tax package now before us. It is, therefore, an amendment that can be supported on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. GLENN. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1120) was agreed to.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to see that it was possible to reach an agreement on this amendment. As I have indicated before, leasing is vital to the automotive industry's attempt to modernize and compete with foreign producers. It is essential if we are to save jobs and create new jobs in my home State of Michigan and throughout the country. This amendment will prevent the changes made from current law by the committee bill from interfering with the kinds of transactions which implement the original intent of the safe harbor leasing provisions. I thank the committee for accepting the amendment.●

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the revisions of the safe harbor leasing provisions contained in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, H.R. 4961, have caused some unanticipated and unintended problems. As with all technical documents, certain circumstances cannot be forseen.

One such example deals with the effect of the leasing repeal provisions on American Motors Corp. American Motors is in the process of producing the new Alliance automobile. This $200 million project involves lease agreements under the current permitted leasing provisions. However, under the conditions imposed in this bill, these leasing arrangements could not proceed. The 90-day rule mandates that these agreements be completed by early August. It is impossible for American Motors to change to the new set of rules within this time period.

For this reason I support language which would state that those assets placed in service prior to July 1, 1982, should be treated as qualifying under the existing law. The Glenn amendment accomplishes this and I give it my full support.

It simply is a managerial impossibility for American Motors or another institution in similar circumstances to review the purchase orders, contracts, work orders, invoices, and related documentation for between 10,000 and 15,000 separate components in order to change over to the new set of rules. Yet without such a modification, potential buyers cannot be assured that there are appropriate tax benefits attached to each.

Allowing American Motors to continue with its leasing arrangements under current law will pose no substantial revenue loss, if any, for fiscal year 1983. Yet without such relief this corporation faces a financial situation that can at best be described as bleak.

The Glenn amendment makes a fair and equitable adjustment that should be supported by the Senate.

AMENDMENT 1976

(Purpose: To clarify the definition of qualified mass commuting vehicles)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I call up amendment 1976 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON) proposes an amendment numbered 1976.

On page 287, at the end of line 23, insert the following new subsection:

(d) QUALIFIED MASS COMMUTING VEHICLE.—Subparagraph (A) of section 103(b)(9) (defining qualified mass commuting vehicle) is amended—

(1) by inserting "ferry," after "rail car", and

(2) by striking out "mass commuting services" in clause (ii) and inserting in lieu thereof "mass transportation services".

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, this amendment has reference to mass transportation services and makes certain that mass transportation services by ferry will be treated exactly as services by rail or by bus in connection with safe harbor leasing provisions. It has been cleared with the distinguished chairman of the committee and the distinguished ranking minority member. The staff felt there was a good chance that present law could be interpreted so as to cover ferries, which are, of course, vitally important in the State of Washington. If that is true, of course, this has no revenue impact at all, but it does treat them identically and represents a change. The impact will be $10 million or less. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this is a very minor amendment. I think the revenue loss is around $5 million. It is a commuting vehicle matter, an extension of what was in the leasing provision last year. The amendment has been discussed. As I understand, it was approved by Treasury officials and approved on both sides of the aisle. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, seeing him on the floor, I suspect my senior colleague (Mr. JACKSON) will join me as a cosponsor.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. I support the statement made by the junior Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1976) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORTON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1119

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this amendment redirects part of the 1982 and 1983 tax cuts away from upper-income taxpayers to those in the middle and lower brackets by replacing the across-the-board marginal tax rate reductions with a set of rate reductions skewed to taxpayers with incomes less than $50,000 a year. It does this while retaining the maximum marginal tax rate of 50 percent.

In effect, every American family with an income of less than $50,000 a year would get a greater portion of the tax cuts in 1982 and 1983, while every family with an income above $50,000 a year would get a slightly smaller portion. Those at the upper end would still achieve the vast majority of the benefit that is now the case, but it would redirect the cut in some part toward middle- and lower-income taxpayers in our country.

The revenue totals of the bill would not be affected by my amendment and, as I said, my amendment would not change the maximum marginal tax rate of 50 percent. This amendment makes good sense from the standpoint of equity and from the standpoint of economic policy. It is equitable because it gives more of the tax cut to those taxpayers that pay the greatest share of total personal income taxes. Last year, the administration argued that across-the-board rate cuts were fair, and that anything else would be a redistributive tax cut. That argument ignored the fact that inflation and social security taxes were raising the total tax liabilities of lower- and middle-income households disproportionately more than upper-income households. The tax cut, if it were to be fair, should have been tailored to reflect this fact.

Unfortunately, the bill signed into law last year did not. Instead, that bill gave taxpayers making more than $50,000 a year over 60 percent of the net tax cut, even though they contribute about one-third of personal income taxes.

Let me repeat that.

Before the tax bill passed last year, those persons in our society who make more than $50,000 a year paid about a third of the income taxes, but under that tax bill they received nearly two-thirds of the tax reduction. Conversely, those who make less than $50,000 a year, who pay nearly two-thirds of the taxes, received about a third of the reduction. Now, that is not fair.

One of the most serious problems we face in this country is the enormous growth of tax evasion, the continuing and increasing failure of Americans to voluntarily pay their taxes.

One of the principal reasons why that is occurring in such an increasing amount is because of the perception by Americans that the tax code is not fair, that those at the upper end of the income scale achieve benefits which are not available to everyone else and as a result do not pay their fair share. And they are right.

Consider what the Senate has done this evening. We have considered a large number of amendments to the tax bill. The only substantive amendment that has been adopted has been an amendment to benefit those who use capital gains taxes. And who uses them? The Senator from Arkansas gave some figures on it a while ago. Let me add one.

Taxpayers who make more than $50,000 a year in our country represent less than 6 percent of the total of all taxpayers, and yet they realize 63 percent of the tax benefits that result from the preferential treatment given to capital gains.

If we keep going in the direction that this tax policy is heading, we will have to amend Lincoln's immortal statement to say, "This is government of the rich people, by the rich people, and especially for the rich people."

That is exactly what the tax policy that we have adopted is moving us toward, and as a result more and more middle-class working Americans are not paying their taxes because they say it is not fair.

Tax deductions, tax preferences, tax shelters, capital gains treatment, while legally available to all Americans, are as a practical matter available to only those at the upper end of the income scale. In the middle are the working Americans, the overwhelming majority of our citizens who work and pay their taxes, and they are becoming disillusioned and as a result a cancer is spreading in American society. That cancer is tax evasion, tax avoidance, people cheating on their income taxes.

The principal reason for that increase in tax evasion is the perception which is based on the reality that the Tax Code is not fair, is designed to benefit the wealthy and is designed to require working people to pay their full share while the wealthy avoid their share. The tax cut we passed last year fosters, furthers, and enhances that perception because that is just exactly what it does. It provides disproportionate benefits for those at the upper end of the income scale.

Adoption of this amendment would help to reverse that trend. It would permit a slight, a modest increase in the amount of the reduction that goes to taxpayers making less than $50,000 a year. Every family in the United States with a total family income of less than $50,000 a year—and that comprises 94 percent of all American families—would get a greater portion of the tax cut if this amendment were adopted. The amendment makes sense not only from the standpoint of equity but it is sound economic policy.

Last year, when the administration came before the Congress and urged us to adopt its tax program, we were told that we had to cut taxes for the wealthy because they would save the money. Supply-side economics said that we need to increase the rate of savings in this country so that the money will then be available for investment in plant and equipment.

Witnesses before the Senate Finance Committee told us that you cannot give most of the tax cut to middle- and lower-income people because they will spend it if you do, and we do not want it spent, we want it saved.

Mr. President, the economic philosophy of the administration has made a 180° turn. Now we are told by every economic spokesman for the administration, and by the President of the United States in a nationally televised press conference, that we are going to get out of this recession because the American people are going to spend the cut that they get on July 1. "Consumers are going to lead the recovery," we are told by everyone associated with the administration up to and including the President of the United States.

If that is true, then what we should be doing, if we really want to get out of the recession, is to give the money to the people who the administration last year told us would spend it if we gave it to them as a result of the tax cut. If the administration was right last year in their analysis of what people would do with the cut and if they are right this year with their analysis of the necessity of increased consumer spending to get out of the recession, then the administration should be up here leading the charge for this amendment, because it is the one thing that will in fact help us to get out of the desperate economic situation which we are now in.

From a standpoint of equity, from a standpoint of fairness, from a standpoint of economic policy, from a standpoint of trying to lift this country out of the mire of recession in which it now finds itself, this amendment makes a great deal of sense. I am, frankly, astonished and amazed that the administration will not support it.

Every day we read that the President says, "Why do they say that I favor the rich and not the poor? I do not really favor the rich," the President says. "I am concerned about the poor."

Well, here is a chance for the President to demonstrate it in something more than words, in something more than just rhetoric. Here is a chance to demonstrate by action that the President is concerned about middle and lower income people and working people in our society. Here is a chance for every Senator to demonstrate that concern.

I repeat what I said at the outset. Before the President's tax program was passed, those in our society who make more than $50,000 a year paid one-third of the income taxes. Under the President's program, they have received nearly two-thirds of the tax reduction. The effect of the reduction goes primarily to those making more than $50,000 a year.

Mr. President, by any standard that is not fair. The American people know it is not fair. The American people demand that it be changed. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment from the standpoint of equity, from the standpoint of economic policy, from the standpoint of saying for once in the debate over this tax bill that we care something about the little man.

I ask the Senate, is there no limit to the concern that we will exhibit for those wealthy persons in our society? Is there no limit to the indifference that we are showing to those at the lower end of the economic scale in our society? This amendment gives us a chance to do what is right for the people of this country, the working people of this country, and for the economy.

I urge the adoption of the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JEPSEN). The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first I want to ask a question of the Senator from Maine.

I think many of our colleagues, including some on each side, hope this vote might not occur until 7:30. Does the Senator from Maine have any objection to this being the first vote at 7:30?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not if it will accommodate my colleagues. I understand that there are to be no votes between 6:30 and 7:30. I hope we can have it before then, but if other Senators will be accommodated by moving it up, it will be all right.

Mr. DOLE. Senator BAUCUS, Senator CHILES, and Senators on this side made the request.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree to that, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. I say to the Senator that I am going to permit an up-and-down vote on the amendment. It is not germane. I think the Senator wants an up-and-down vote, so that will not be a problem.

Mr. President, this amendment was discussed briefly in the committee, and I believe that the Senator from Maine presented it properly. I just cannot support it.

I believe that if we are really concerned about fairness and equity, we will all vote to support this bill on final passage tonight.

We talked about those we have taken on in this bill—the rich, the powerful, the big banks, the big oil companies, the highly paid professionals, the insurance companies, the big restaurants. Obviously, the big banks are fighting tooth and toenail with respect to withholding interest on dividends, as well as people who do not pay their taxes.

I do not think the people have been concerned very much, but is has been very difficult to hold the package together. It is still being held together. I hope the Senator's amendment will be defeated and that we can all join in defeating the other amendments and get to final passage. It will not happen quite that quickly.

I just cannot support the Senator's amendment, for reasons I have outlined before.

Unless the Senator wants to be heard further, I am willing to set aside the amendment temporarily and to agree that this be the first vote at 7:30.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma has another amendment that has been cleared and is not controversial. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment, for himself, Senator DODD, and Senator DURENBERGER, be considered now.

Mr. BOREN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1121

(Purpose: To clarify the status of certain private foundations and trusts owning certain business enterprises)

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN), for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. DODD, and Mr. NICKLES proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1121.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 454, strike out lines 1 through 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 292. EXEMPTION FROM THE EXCESS BUSINESS HOLDING PROVISIONS FOR PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS AND TRUSTS OWNING CERTAIN BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

On page 454, line 6, strike out "Section" and insert in lieu thereof "(a) Private Foundations.—Section".

On page 458, line 21, strike out the quotation marks and the second period.

On page 458, between lines 21 and 22, insert the following:

"(iv) The divestiture requirements of section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not apply to the stock of an incorporated business enterprise held by any private foundation if the foundation meets the following conditions:

"(I) On March 1, 1913, and at all times thereafter, the private foundation primarily operated and maintained facilities for the long-term care, comfort, maintenance, or education of permanently and totally disabled persons, elderly persons, needy widows, or children.

"(II) On May 26, 1969, the private foundation owned 100 percent of the voting stock in one or more incorporated business enterprises.

"(III) Before July 2, 1950, the foundation formed the incoporated business enterprise described in subclause (II), or acquired the stock in such enterprises by gift, devise, or bequest.

"(IV) Neither the donor of such assets or of such stock in the incorporated business enterprises nor any member of his family (within the meaning of section 4946(d) of such Code) is a manager of such foundation (as defined in section 4946(b) of such Code) on or after April 1, 1940.

"(V) On May 26, 1969, and at all times thereafter, the business of the enterprise or enterprises owned by the foundation and described in subclause (II) is of substantially the same character as the business which was conducted by such enterprise on the date of its formation by the foundation or on the date of the last gift, devise, or bequest of the stock of such enterprise to the foundation by any donor.

For purposes of this clause, a care facility described in subclause (I) owned by a private foundation through a holding company all the voting stock of which is owned directly by the foundation on the dates designated by this clause shall be treated as being owned directly by the foundation for these purposes. This clause shall apply to the private foundation only if the foundation does not acquire any stock or other interest in any business enterprise on or after May 26, 1969, which would otherwise constitute excess business holdings under section 4943 of such Code.

"(v) The divestiture requirements of section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not apply to the stock of an incorporated business enterprise or Bank Holding Company held by any private foundation if the foundation meets the following conditions:

"(I) On May 26, 1969, the private foundation owned 100 percent of the voting stock in an incorporated business enterprise or Bank Holding Company (as defined in the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956).

"(II) The stock, described in subclause (I) was acquired by the foundation solely by gift, devise, or bequest before December 31, 1966.

"(III) Neither the donor of such stock nor any member of his family (within the meaning of section 4946(d) of such Code) is a manager of such foundation (as defined in section 1946(b) of such Code) on or after December 31, 1956.

"(IV) On May 26, 1969, and at all times theraftер, the business of the enterprise or Bank Holding Company described in subclause (I) is of substantially the same character as the business which was conducted by such incorporated business enterprise or Bank Holding Company on the date of the last gift, devise, or bequest of the stock of such enterprise or Bank Holding Company to the foundation by any donor or member of his family.

For purposes of this clause, a business enterprise owned by a private foundation through a holding company (other than a Bank Holding Company) all the voting stock of which is owned directly by the foundation on the dates designated by this clause shall be treated as being owned directly by the foundation for these purposes. This clause shall apply to the private foundation only if the foundation does not directly acquire any stock or other interest in any business enterprise on or after May 26, 1969, which would otherwise constitute excess business holdings under section 4943 of such Code.".

(b)(1) Trusts.—For purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, a trust—

(A) substantially all of the assets of which on November 19, 1950, consisted of stock in a newspaper publishing company,

(B) which has an unexpired interest devoted to one or more of the purposes described in paragraph (1) or (2) (B) of section 170(c) of such Code, and shall not be treated as a private foundation by reason of paragraph (1) or (2) of section 4947 (a) of such Code (relating to application of taxes to charitable and split interest trusts).

(C) which has as one of its primary purposes the continued management of a newspaper publishing company in order to benefit the community.

(2) This subsection shall apply to taxable years beginning after November 20, 1978.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, this amendment, which I offer on behalf of Mr. DODD, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. NICKLES, and myself, is a noncontroversial amendment which has been cleared on both sides of the aisle.

This amendment relates to the section of the law dealing with private foundations and the operation of businesses by those foundations. It deals with three specific instances in which there are business operations maintained by foundations which have a purely public purpose.

Mr. President, in Sand Springs, Okla., is a unique organization that blends the generous services of a charitable organization with the business initiatives of private enterprise. The Sand Springs Home provides care for orphans and widows, and it supports itself fully through its business holdings. A provision in the Tax Code, however, could force the home to lose these holdings, and this amendment would allow the home to continue providing the same valuable services it has provided for nearly 75 years.

The Sand Springs Home was established in 1908 and has cared for a total of 800 dependent children since then. The home also provides facilities in which widows can live and raise their children. Currently, there are 35 orphans at the home, with a total of 370 widows and their children. There is a waiting list of 160 widows, all with at least two children.

There can be no doubt that the home is fulfilling its charitable purposes. The founder, recognizing the value of such organizations, established a generous endowment, which has allowed the home to be completely self-supporting. The home has never sought public contributions. The assets of the home are managed by a board of trustees, who are appointed by the Oklahoma Grand Master of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. Since its formation the home has spent $20 million for its charitable services.

The assets of the Sand Springs Home include several tracts of land, investments in government obligations, and 100 percent of the stock in several local businesses. In addition to providing the home's operating costs, these businesses give work opportunities to both the widows and the young people at the home. A provision in the Tax Act of 1969 may force the home to lose ownership of these interests.

When Congress wrote the 1969 law, a number of individuals created foundations to avoid paying estate taxes on inherited family enterprises. To stop this practice, Congress passed a provision to force all foundations to divest themselves of majority ownership in all enterprises. As a result, private foundations who show no hint of tax fraud or abuse must nevertheless divest their holdings. My amendment would exempt the Sand Springs Home from this overly broad provision.

There are several reasons the Senate should pass this amendment. First, the reasons Congress passed the divestiture requirements are not remotely similar to the circumstances surrounding the Sand Springs Home's establishment. Exemption of the home from divestiture requirements would have no effect on budget receipts through fiscal year 1987. In addition, there is precedent for this legislation, for the U.S. Senate has passed similar measures in the past.

Finally, and in my opinion most important, the divestiture requirement leaves the home's future uncertain. On Wednesday of last week, the home's board of trustees voted to expand its services and begin providing care for many of the 160 widows on its waiting list. They obviously cannot do this if they are forced to sell their businesses.

The value of the Sand Springs Home is clear. Its service to the homeless of Sand Springs is unique. Losing its business holdings would severely limit these important services.

Mr. President, I think it would certainly be a matter of affirming sound public policy to approve this amendment and assure that the many helpless people who are being served by these particular foundations would continue to be able to be served in the most efficient way possible. This would simply allow those foundations to continue to operate as they have in the past.

I urge the adoption of the amendment.

I yield at this point to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma and others.

This amendment to section 292 of the bill adds language that will have the effect of exempting the Otto Bremer Foundation, along with the two other foundations given relief in the committee's bill, from the divestiture requirements of section 4943 of the Code.

During the committee's deliberations when my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Colorado, Mr. ARMSTRONG, offered his amendment that is section 292 of this bill, he stated that it was his understanding that the language covered the Otto Bremer Foundation as well. As I shared in that understanding, I did not offer additional language. Unfortunately, this is not the case and thus the need for my amendment today.

The Otto Bremer Foundation is unique in that it is the only private foundation that is also a registered bank holding company. The bank holding company operates in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and North Dakota.

The Foundation is caught in a conflict between the private foundation requirements set out in section 4943 of the Code and applicable Federal banking laws.

Under section 4943 of the Code, the Foundation is required to divest itself of ownership in the bank holding company to no more than 50 percent by 1989. But because of the McFadden Act, the Foundation is unable to sell to other domestic purchasers and because of antitrust regulations cannot sell to Minnesota-domiciled purchasers. Foreign purchasers are not interested because the company is not located in a money market center or in the Sun Belt or other growth areas. So the only answer is to become a publicly held company and sell its stock by a public offering.

But, because final regulations under section 4943 have not been issued in many years—and given all the activity we are generating with this bill, I do not anticipate they will get issued in the foreseeable future—the holding company and its underlying banks are restricted in their operations.

The result is that the stock is not marketable. And if the stock is not marketable, the Foundation cannot comply with the divestiture rules of section 4943.

I have discussed this amendment with the majority and minority managers of the bill and understand it is acceptable to them.

I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut to offer a further explanation.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the New London Day Trust is a very narrow, specific situation involving only that particular periodical and trust, the latter of which was established for the purpose of serving the community in which the newspaper resides. Any excess profits generated by the paper, which is substantially owned by the Day Trust, are to be given to charity.

That was the intent of the original publisher of the newspaper, and the provisions contained in this amendment will allow that trust to continue to serve the designs of the original publisher of the paper.

Mr. President, a purpose of this amendment is to permit the Day, a New London, Conn., daily publication, to continue its services as a community newspaper and as a contributor to local charities and nonprofit causes.

The Day was founded by Theodore Bodenwein, a German immigrant with ambitious and constructive ideas. In 1938, Mr. Bodenwein's will created a split-interest trust to own his paper and, upon his death, to pay 10 percent of its dividends to charitable organizations and the remaining 90 percent to his heirs until their deaths. Since the death of the last family member in 1978, all profits not reinvested in the newspaper have been distributed to charitable organizations in the community, as Mr. Bodenwein's will instructed.

However, in March of 1981, the Internal Revenue Service ruled that the trust was in fact a private foundation, and that under the terms of the Tax Reform Act of 1969, the trust would be required to take actions which would put it out of business as a supporter of local, nonprofit causes. In addition, the trust would have faced additional tax liabilities which could very well have resulted in its having to pay taxes in excess of its income. This amendment will allow the Day to continue to receive the tax law advantages of a split-interest trust. In these times of fiscal austerity, particularly in the area of social services, it is imperative that we encourage private sector contributions of the sort provided by the Day trust. Mr. Bodenwein and the Day trust ought to serve as examples of philanthropic generosity which is admired and respected, and not taxed to the point of uselessness. For more than 40 years, the Day trust has set a shining example. Today, I propose that we allow this to continue by adopting this amendment.

I am delighted to support the amendment as offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

I urge its adoption.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) be included as a cosponsor of this amendment also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who desires time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield back his time?

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am happy to yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment (UP No. 1121) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, is the committee amendment still pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, it is.

89-059 O-86-19 (Pt.13)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment Mr. STEVENS intends to propose may be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1122

(Purpose: To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to clarify the status of certain amateur athletic organizations)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1122.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I aks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, add the following new section:

That (a) section 501 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by redesignating subsection (j) as subsection (k) and by inserting after subsection (i) the following new subsection:

"(j) SPECIAL RULES FOR CERTAIN AMATEUR SPORTS ORGANIZATIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a qualified amateur sports organization—

"(A) the requirement of subsection (c)(3) that no part of its activities involve the provision of athletic facilities or equipment shall not apply, and

"(B) such organization shall not fail to meet the requirements of subsection (c)(3) merely because its membership is local or regional in nature.

"(2) QUALIFIED AMATEUR SPORTS ORGANIZATION DEFINED.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'qualified amateur sports organization' means any organization organized and operated exclusively to foster national or international amateur sports competition if such organization is also organized and operated primarily to conduct national or international competition in sports included on the program of the Olympic games or the pan-American games or to support and develop amateur athletes for national or international competition in such sports.".

(b)(1) Subsection (c) of section 170 of such Code (defining charitable contribution) is amended by adding at the end of paragraph (2) the following new sentence: "Rules similar to the rules of section 501(j) shall apply for purposes of this paragraph.".

(2) Subsection (a) of section 2055 of such Code (relating to transfers for public, charitable, and religious uses) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Rules similar to the rules of section 501(j) shall apply for purposes of paragraph (2).".

(3) Subsection (a) of section 2522 of such Code (relating to charitable and similar gifts) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Rules similar to the rules of section 501(j) shall apply for purposes of paragraph (2).".

(c) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 5, 1976.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am presenting this amendment to try and deal with a very serious problem relating to the tax exempt status of certain amateur sports organizations.

This amendment is an important measure which can lift a tax barrier to our Nation's efforts for the Olympics, and all amateur sports competitors. Bills similar to this amendment have had hearings in both the House and Senate, and to my knowledge everyone, including the Treasury Department, wants to solve this problem immediately.

The text of this amendment is identical to the bill that I introduced in 1981, S. 1757.

Briefly, let me outline the problem to the Senate. In 1976, Congress amended section 501(c)(3) of the Revenue Code by section 2702 of the Tax Reform Act of 1976, which made it easier for certain amateur sports organizations to receive tax exempt status.

This amendment was the product of efforts on the part of those who strongly supported amateur sports and was intended to help clear up the inconsistencies in the tax code and assist those organizations that were organized and operated to foster national and international sports competition.

During consideration of this amendment in conference committee, language was added excluding from consideration for tax exempt status those organizations which provided training facilities and equipment.

That action was taken, according to the conference committee report and statements on the Senate floor, to prevent health spas and social clubs from obtaining a tax windfall.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, even though the clear intent of Congress was not to deny tax exempt status to amateur sports organizations which foster competitive sports, and who provide training facilities and equipment, that is precisely what has happened.

The Internal Revenue Service, feeling that their hands are tied in this matter, has read the statute literally to mean that no tax exempt organization may provide training facilities and equipment.

Mr. President, for 5 years, and especially since the 1978 Amateur Sports Act spun off new national governing bodies for competitive sports, this statute has caused tremendous financial problems for the amateur sports world and that is why our immediate action is necessary. Many of the development drives that assist and prepare our Olympic athletes and other national and regional amateur sports programs are at a standstill simply because it is necessary for many of these organizations to provide training facilities and equipment and they cannot receive tax exempt status under the current interpretation.

Not only has this ambiguity in the tax code caused the sports organizations grief, but it has created an administrative headache to the service as well. As I understand it, there are over 100 501(c)(3) applications pending at the Internal Revenue Service, on which no action can be realistically taken until this ambiguity is cleared up.

My good friend, Mr. VANDER JAGT, of Michigan, has assisted on this legislative effort in the House. This is simply a technical clarification of what I believe has always been the congressional intent in according these amateur sports organizations a tax-exempt status, and as I have indicated, these organizations cannot hold on financially any longer without their tax status question being settled.

As far as I know, the cost to the Treasury is inconsequential. There should be none, and it should have been taken into account under the 1976 amendments to the Internal Revenue Code anyway, when we told these organizations we were creating a tax-exempt status for them.

I do appreciate the courtesy of the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Kansas, and I hope that he will be able to agree to this amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Can we get a copy of the amendment? I am trying to get one.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask unanimous consent that the time not be charged to anyone at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while negotiations are going on, I wonder if we might temporarily set the amendment aside and take up another one or two amendments that are ready to go.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am happy to do so.

I wonder if the Senator from Ohio has had a chance to review the legislation.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Give me 5 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. We can take one or two others.

Senator GARN raises a good point that if we do not charge the time of the quorum calls we will be here until next week.

The Senator from Illinois sought recognition.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think the Senator from Ohio is willing to withdraw an objection to the amendment of mine.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. DOLE. All time is yielded back.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska.

The amendment (UP No. 1122) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1123

(Purpose: To clarify the tax status of certain members of religious orders)

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON, for himself, Mr. LONG, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. PERCY, Mr. EAGLETON, and Mr. DANFORD) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1123.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 425, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following new section:

SEC. 274A. CLARIFICATION OF TAX STATUS OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, a member of a religious order who—

(1) is required to take a vow of poverty and obedience,

(2) is required to wear a religious habit and live in a convent, and

(3) performs qualified services, shall be treated as an agent of such order while performing such qualified services.

(b) QUALIFIED SERVICES.—For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified services' means services—

(1) which are performed by a member of a religious order,

(2) which are required by the religious order to be performed,

(3) which are performed by such member as an employee of a leprosarium operated by the Public Health Service, and

(4) any remuneration with respect to which—

(A)(i) is paid to such order, or

(ii) if paid to such member, is, pursuant to the vows of poverty and obedience taken by such member, the property of such order, and

(B) may be used or disposed of only at the direction of such order.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to services performed after September 30, 1977.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, this amendment involves the very small religious order known as the Daughters of Charity who work in a leprosarium in Louisiana. They have taken the oath of poverty. All of their funds are passed through their religious order.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senators from Louisiana, Senator RUSSELL LONG and Senator BENNETT JOHNSTON, the distinguished Senators from Missouri, Senator JACK DANFORTH and Senator TOM EAGLETON, and my colleague, the senior Senator from Illinois, Senator PERCY, be shown as cosponsors with me on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, Treasury has approved the amendment which essentially absolves them of taxes if they belong to the religious order, wear their religious habits, live in a convent, and work in this leprosarium.

I think it is entirely nonobjectionable, and I yield to the Senator from Kansas, the distinguished manager of this bill, for any further comments he may care to make.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Internal Revenue Service is justifiably concerned about tax protestors who evade taxes by establishing a so-called church and taking a vow of poverty.

However, there should be little argument that the nuns that the Senator from Illinois wants to exempt from tax are working under a bona fide vow of poverty and should not be subject to tax.

It would seem that a narrow exception would be a reasonable compromise which would allow the Treasury Department time to work out a satisfactory solution to this tax protestor problem while developing reasonable guidelines for nonabuse situations and without establishing an adverse precedent.

I understand there are some people who gather together and call themselves a church so they can evade tax.

That is not, of course, the case with the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. In fact, I am well acquainted with Sister Evangeline Thomas who has a direct interest in this amendment. I know of the great work they are doing.

I have no objection to the amendment. I understand it has been cleared by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG). The Treasury has no objection—it has reservations but no objection.

I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DIXON. I yield back the remainder of my time and I move the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1123) was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agree to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be equally charged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

QUALIFIED RETIREMENT PLANS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, many of my constituents are extremely concerned over provisions of this bill dealing with qualified retirement plans. While I support the necessity of this bill as a means of reducing the projected budget deficits, I question the wisdom of some of its provisions, including those pertaining to qualified retirement plans. The effect of most of these provisions is to reduce the amount of contributions that can be made to qualified plans. I am concerned that these provisions were adopted with insufficient attention given to their impact on the establishment of new plans and the very continuance of existing plans.

These changes will force virtually all pension and profitsharing plans to be amended, at a considerable cost to the plan sponsor. The burden of making these changes, coupled with the reduced incentives for establishing and maintaining plans, may cause a significant number of plan cancellations. This would adversely affect all participating employees, not just the principals in the sponsoring corporation. In other words, these limitations on retirement plan contributions will not only impact the professionals and business owners who have established the plans. The effect will extend to the nurses, clerical workers, secretaries, laborers, and other employees who now participate in these pension and profitsharing plans.

Beyond this, there is no doubt that the reduction of contributions to plans will have an adverse effect on long-term savings. This undermines the basic thrust of the 1981 tax reduction bill, which was designed to encourage greater savings by individuals.

In spite of my concern over the provisions in this bill, they are far less damaging to private plans than the provisions of H.R. 6410, introduced a few weeks ago in the House of Representatives by Congressman RANGEL. We do not know what the House will do with respect to these provisions when this bill reaches that body. However, there is great concern that the House will go substantially beyond the provisions of the Senate bill, and will adopt the additional restrictions and limitations set forth in H.R. 6410. This would be very, very damaging to the private pension sector. The provisions of H.R. 6410, in my judgment, are particularly unfair to the owners and employees of small corporations.

Regardless of what the House may do, I sincerely hope that the conferees will not go beyond the provisions adopted in the Senate. Thus, I strongly urge the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, who has so skillfully managed this bill, to stand firm in the conference with the House against any further damaging changes in these qualified pension and profit-sharing plans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that several letters, indicative of hundreds which I have received on this subject, be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHADBOURNE, PARKE,
WHITESIDE & WOLFF,
New York, N.Y., July 21, 1982.

Senator STROM THURMOND,
Russell Senate Office Building.,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: The next several weeks will be critical for this Nation's private pension system. Congress will either damage that system irreparably or it will resist the pressures to deal harshly with private pensions in the name of cutting tax benefits for the rich. If Congress takes the first course, that would be a national calamity. I would also view it as an enormous personal loss. I write you from this narrower perspective, because I was the IRS's first Assistant Commissioner for Employee Plans and Exempt Organizations ("EPEO") following enactment of ERISA in 1974.

The entire IRS, as well as the Department of Labor and PBGC, and other government agencies as well—Treasury, SEC, Social Security, EEOC, FTC, to mention a few—invested enormous energy and expense in implementing ERISA for fully five years after its enactment. The Division of IRS which I headed, EPEO, alone devoted substantially all its expanded manpower, and some 20 supergrades, and tens of millions of dollars of budget appropriations to the determination letter program associated with the requalification of hundreds of thousands of pension and profit-sharing plans, necessitated by enactment of ERISA. Audit efforts in the employee plans area, as well as in the charitable and exempt organizations areas, grinded essentially to a halt for at least four years while this determination letter effort was underway.

Much of that will have been wasted, for it will all have to happen once again, if provisions similar to those contained in the so-called Pension Equity Tax Act, introduced by Mr. Rangel (H.R. 6410), or even the slightly less devastating but still far-reaching pension provisions included in the Senate Finance Committee's tax and budget reconciliation package, become law. The plan amendments that would become necessary, as a result of the pervasive changes in plan design that the proposed legislation would require, will rival those associated with the initial enactment of ERISA in 1974.

The revenue estimates for the pension proposals, as projected by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, are $300 million in 1983 and $800 million in 1984. Others have speculated that the cost to business of implementing these pension changes would exceed $1 billion-tax deductible expenses, I might note. But what will be the direct government costs for gearing up and carrying out the renewed monitoring efforts necessitated by all of these plan amendments? I would estimate a minimum of $100 million for just IRS, DOL and PBGC in each of the next two fiscal years. However, you should most certainly demand such estimates from the affected government agencies before you embark upon a legislative overhaul of the magnitude that has been proposed for the private pension system. When these new direct government costs, plus the additional tax revenue losses due to business tax deductions for the newly required expenses of amending plans, are added together, the revenue savings from the proposed restructuring of the pension system will be sharply reduced, if not eliminated entirely. That is a most significant fact, since these changes in the pension system are offered as revenue-enhancing measures!

Of course, one might say that whatever the cost in revenue, changes in the tax structure designed to achieve greater tax equity are justified. There are, I submit, two short answers to this. First, any major changes in so complex a statute as ERISA should be effectuated only with the most careful and prolonged deliberation, such as is not possible in the context of a budget reconciliation process. Second, there can be little doubt that the "pension equity" that is introduced through this legislation will prove to be a Pyrrhic victory for its proponents, because the small companies of this country will opt out of the pension system in droves, for these principal reasons:

(1) The "game will not be worth the candle" for the small business proprietors, for whom there must be significant personal advantage if they are to be motivated to provide pensions for their employees; and

(2) The legal, actuarial and administrative expenses of one more round of plan amendments, after the several such rounds necessitated by ERISA and its accompanying regulations, will clearly be more than the small business community will accept.

Hence, pension "equity" will become pension denial. I need not tell you what that will do to the Social Security system, let alone the private pension program.

I urge that you personally do all in your power to prevent pension legislation from being enacted in haste, lest you, your colleagues and the Country's retirees grieve at leisure.

Sincerely yours,

ALVIN D. LURIE.

Re Pension "Equity" Bill H.R. 6410.

Senator STROM THURMOND,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: I want to express my extreme displeasure with the possible changes proposed in H.R. 6410, the Pension "Equity" Tax Bill of 1982, and similar legislation pending in the Senate. It is obvious that someone is trying to do a railroad job through Congress. Action is expected very soon which does not give adequate time for a free flow of information on the Bill.

At first blush, it would seem that the Bill is attempting to equalize corporate plans with Keogh plans and raise additional revenue for the United States Government. In reality, the Bill will jeopardize the retirement security of working Americans, and it will result in lower revenue on a long-term basis. There are several fallacies in this belief:

(1) Most wealthy persons who are contributing to the maximum in their pension plans have the means and sophisticated tax resources to hire professionals for other tax shelters. They will scale back their pension and profit-sharing plans to these new limits and curtail or eliminate the benefits for rank-and-file employes. The law may mean a virtual elimination of many small retirement plans. We will seriously consider eliminating our plan because of the extra overhead expense.

(2) This plan will line the pockets of tax-shelter salesmen. It will not raise significant additional revenue for the United States Government because the people who could afford to put extremely large amounts of money into retirement plans will invest in tax shelters. They will not be affected by this legislation. The people who will be affected are the rank-and-file employees whose benefits will be cut.

(3) The entire ERISA pension and profit-sharing scheme has been designed to encourage rank-and-file benefits when benefits are given to the highly-compensated employees. This has been a very effective tool for giving additional pension benefits to all employees because it is required to obtain the tax advantages offered by Internal Revenue Code Sections 401 and 501.

(4) The Bill represents an unconscionable attempt to discriminate against small business and professionals, doctors, lawyers, architects, engineers, accountants, dentists, veterinarians, pharmacists, and all other persons in the service area. Why should Congress permit this type of negative discrimination? You can be certain that the professional people around the country, all of who have to work every day for their living, will rise up against people who support this legislation. I will personally be very opposed to any individual who votes for this legislation.

(5) The 1981 Tax Act represented a major victor for big business. Through a combination of qualified stock options, equipment leasing rules, fast depreciation write-offs, special investment tax credit incentives, and other "goodies", recent newspaper articles and economic studies have shown that most major corporations will not pay any income tax, or a very slight amount. Those same corporations adopt discriminatory, non-qualified deferred compensation arrangements. They are "non-qualified" because they only provide benefits for the executives. Small business and professional associations do not do this because they cannot take advantage of tax incentives offered to big business and they are generally willing to put up with the ERISA restrictions in order to fund pension plans for the executives and other employees. You are creating a two-tiered system here, one which allows executives only to be funded with special benefits in major U.S. corporations, while restricting benefits for small business and professionals.

(6) This Bill reverses the basic policy of encouraging investments which will provide jobs. This Bill will put increasing presure on the social security system. The benefits for rank-and-file employees will be reduced because the plans will be curtailed or eliminated.

(7) I urge you to work strongly against HR 6410, and any similar legislation. Please keep me advised of the progress of this Bill and any similar Bill in the Senate.

(8) Philosophically, I have another complaint about HR 6410. Congress exempts itself and other governmental employees from social security. Small businessmen pay social security taxes for their employees and they must pay those taxes into a system that is functionally bankrupt. In addition, congressmen and senators and government employees have federal pension benefits indexed with social security. There is a double-dipping and triple-dipping in the pension system. Many federal employees retire with a tremendous pension benefit and they join social security for a short period of time to get an additional social security benefit. This Bill will reduce the retirement security of middle and working class people everywhere in America.

Very truly yours,

Re The Pension Equity Act of 1982—H.R. 6410.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: The above Bill was introduced May 19, 1982 by Congressman Rangel of New York apparently in an effort to generate immediate tax revenues. Based on the context of the Bill as reported, we consider this proposed legislation to be hastily conceived and not at all in the best interests of employees throughout this country who have been forewarned, even by the President's Commission on Pension Policy, to rely more and more on individual effort and the private pension systems to provide for retirement.

We understand also that the Senate Finance Committee met on July 1 to consider similar legislation and has in process a proposal that would essentially copy the Rangel Bill.

The major thrust of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA) was directed toward incentives designed to encourage employees to establish and maintain retirement accounts as supplements to company plans and social security. H.R. 6410, if enacted, would be a reversal in principle from ERTA and would inject more confusion and inconsistency into the retirement system.

The provisions of the Bill limiting, and in most respects reducing, heretofore allowable contributions and benefits would discourage the formation of new retirement plans by smaller businesses and especially by the professional service corporations and rules. Such discouragement would simply increase the burden on our unstable social security system to provide more and more retirement benefits for these individuals who otherwise could have been covered by a private company plan.

We anticipate also that many smaller companies will decide to discontinue their existing retirement plans due to the new rules, new bureaucracy and increased administration and costs inherent in the passage of such a far-reaching Bill. As you may recall, this was the reaction of many companies following the enactment of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act on 1974 (ERISA).

ERISA was the result of almost ten years of study and preparation and the process of changes in that law and the issuance of final regulations thereunder still continue to this date. H.R. 6410 would add more complexity to this legislative area which may already be the most difficult to understand and administer. As we are now settling somewhat in the aftermath of ERISA, H.R. 6410 comes along and creates havoc again.

We believe that legislative change of the magnitude represented by H.R. 6410 should warrant very careful and deliberate consideration and that such consideration should be made in political environment not pressured by current budget deficits. The self-help concept that has been fostered by the present Administration would be dealt a severe blow and be perceived by employees across the country as another ill-conceived and untimely effort to generate current tax revenues at the expense of future retirement benefits.

We serve in a fiduciary capacity for several hundred corporate retirement plans throughout the state. We have notified these plan sponsors of the negative effect H.R. 6410 could have on their current retirement programs.

Please help us defeat this proposed legislation now under consideration by committees in both the House and the Senate.

Sincerely,

DENNIS C. ADAMS,
Vice President,
Pension Development.

T. R. W. WILSON MEMORIAL LABORATORIES,
Greenville, S.C., July 15, 1982.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Senator from South Carolina,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: I am very much disturbed by several proposals being discussed in the Senate Finance Committee which would change drastically the pension and profit-sharing plans for professionals "in the field of health, law, engineering, architecture, accounting, actuarial science, performing arts, athletics, or consulting." The corresponding bill in the House, H.R. 6410, ironically enough is called "The Pension Equity Tax Act of 1982". What both of these proposals actually do is create a discriminatory situation for those participants in corporate pension plans opposed to those participants in professional pension plans. The original acts were set up to end this gross discrimination. The current proposals would restore the glaring inequities. According to my information, the proposed plan would reduce the maximum annual contribution limit, place a 2-year freeze on the cost of living adjustment, increase the early retirement age from 55 to 62, reduce the cumulative total dollar amount limitation of benefits, and prevent a person from borrowing on his plan. We have been as liberal as the law allows with our employees and consider that our pension and profit-sharing plan is a real benefit. However, if these benefits are truncated, it would place us at an unfair competitive advantage with private industry. Not only that, in these days of high interest rates and continuing inflation, the pension and profit plan is frequently the only source from which our employees can borrow money at reasonable interest rates, if they can borrow money at all.

I am grateful for the small tax cut which was put through by the Reagan Administration last year, even though it was somewhat delayed. However, it was more than offset by an increase in my Social Security tax. Since this increase in Social Security tax did not increase my ultimate benefits, I can only consider it a form of income tax which the government is too dishonest to call an income tax. However, if this present destruction of the professional pension and profit-sharing plan goes through, I and my colleagues and employees will be in much worse shape as far as our ultimate retirement and present day existence than we were two years ago under the Carter Administration. I believe this entire proposal is a total reversal of the publicly supported Reagan Administration philosophy to reduce or maintain at present levels the amount of taxes to which a person is subjected. I would appreciate very much your opposition to these proposals.

Thank you.

DONALD G. KILGORE, Jr., M.D.

GREENVILLE, S.C., July 16, 1982.

Hon. J. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: I am concerned about the recently agreed revenue raising proposals of the Senate Finance Committee and H.R. 6410 (The Pension Equity Tax Act) as they are related to reduction in benefits from retirement programs.

According to a recent editorial in the Wall Street Journal, it is estimated that 68 percent of those now in private pension plans would suffer reduced benefits.

At a time when everyone is concerned about the future of Social Security, it seems unfortunate that Congress would attempt to place further limitations on private pension plans.

Further, with recovery and growth dependent on generating more private savings and investment, it does not appear logical to start draining the capital in private pension pools.

We need bigger and better private pension systems, not weaker ones.

Your consideration of the harmful effects of this bill will be appreciated.

Respectfully,

GORDON E. WILLIAMS.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DOLE. And let it be charged equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey may be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1124

Mr. BRADLEY. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY) for himself and Mr. BRADY proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1124.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

Title III of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by inserting immediately after section 330 therein the following new section:

VERY HIGH FREQUENCY STATIONS

SEC. 331. It shall be the policy of the Federal Communications Commission to allocate channels for very high frequency commercial television broadcasting in a manner which ensures that not less than one such channel shall be allocated to each State, if technically feasible. In any case in which a licensee of a very high frequency commercial television broadcast station notifies the Commission to the effect that such licensee will agree to the reallocation of its channel to a community within a State in which there is allocated no very high frequency commercial television broadcast channel at the time of such notification, the Commission shall, notwithstanding any other provision of law, order such reallocation and issue a license to such licensee for that purpose pursuant to such notification for a term of not to exceed five years as provided in section 307(d) of the Communications Act of 1934.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, this amendment regarding a very high frequency television station in New Jersey has been dealt with by the Senate on thrge separate occasions, the last time by a vote of 86 to 4. It is cleared by Senator PACKWOOD, Senator DOLE, and Senator LONG. I offer it on behalf of Senator BRADY and myself.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment. It is not germane, but it is a very important amendment and I am not going to raise any point of order on germaneness. It has previously passed the Senate by 86 to 4. It involves a very high frequency station in New Jersey. I am willing to accept the amendment. It has been cleared by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY).

The amendment (UP No. 1124) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1125

(Purpose: To exempt interest payments of $100 or less from the withholding requirements)

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1125.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 475, line 22, strike out "$10" and insert in lieu thereof "$100".

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, the amendment that I have deals with the withholding of interest and would increase the threshold at which the banks and savings and loans or other institutions would have to withhold interest. Presently in the law it says that if their interest income on an annual basis was $10 or less they would not have to withhold taxes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Chair.

The present law, as it is in the bill as drafted by the Finance Committee, has a threshold that says if your interest is $10 or less, you will not have to have withholding. The effect of my amendment is to increase that from $10 to $100.

Mr. President, I think all Members should know the effect of this amendment, because I am sure that everyone will be asked this question. If we increase that up to $100, which I hope that we will do and which I am pleased that the Finance Committee chairman and also the administration have agreed to this, it would have a very important effect because what it will do will exempt a greater number of small accounts that are in savings and loans and in banks from mandating that they have to have withholding. In other words, you could have $1,000 in a bank account and if it was paying 8-percent interest, the interest would be $80 and, therefore, it would not be mandated that they would have to withhold on that account.

So the real important aspect of this is that we will be eliminating the mandatory withholding on the interest of small accounts if that interest is less than $100 a year. That boils down to $25 a quarter.

If they happen to have passbook savings and they are earning 5¼ percent, they could have almost $2,000 in their account and not to have withholding taken out of their interest income. So I think it is a very positive thing. I think it will save millions of small savers from having an unnecessary penalty of withholding from their accounts.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for his assistance and also the assistance of his staff and the administration in working with me to come up with this exemption. The Senator from Kansas has other exemptions for persons that pay small amounts of income tax who will not have withholding. He also put in an exemption for persons who are over the age of 65. I compliment him on both of those exemptions.

I think this exemption, too, will go a long way toward restoring a little commonsense to this withholding amendment. It will save banks and S. & L.'s and other institutions a great deal of headaches and paperwork where they will not be required to withhold on small accounts. For example, if a person's interest income was $20 per quarter under the bill as it is, they would have to withhold $2. Now they will not have to do that. Certainly withholding $2 is not worth the time and expense for that institution to withhold that amount, report it, send it to the IRS, and later have the taxpayer probably file for a refund.

So I think it is a commonsense amendment. I think it will help restore some commonsense to this withholding section for interest, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the committee bill provides that the payor of minimal interest payments may elect not to withhold payments which aggregate less than $10 if made on an annual basis. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, I think, is an excellent amendment and should go a long way in dispelling any fears, with all the other protections we have built in to the withholding section of our bill. I hope this will ease passage or make it more difficult to knock out the withholding section which will follow this amendment.

The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma increases the $10 minimal amount in the committee bill to $100. The revenue effect in 1983 is $47 million, in 1984 is $33 million, and in 1985 is $35 million, for a total of $115 million.

Under this provision, no withholding will be required when the amount withheld on an annual basis would be less than $100. This will eliminate a substantial amount of nuisance paperwork on small transactions.

Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, who has been working on ways to make the withholding of interest and dividends work. He has been very helpful the past 2 days as we have sought ways to make certain we could assure our colleagues that what we were doing is consistent with tax compliance and at the same time that we are not making any change that would unduly impact on people 65 years of age or over, low-income Americans, or anybody with a small amount or minimal amount of interest or dividend income. We think this amendment is very helpful. I hope it will be adopted. I commend the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I join in supporting the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. I think it is clearly the direction in which we want to be going. I hope that we go further, that we knock out this entire provision. The fact that we are recognizing the need for this exemption, I think, is important, and I hope that the Senator's amendment passes.

At the same time, I think it is important to point out, in the process of adding another exemption along with the other exemptions that we have already added, we are simply increasing the paperwork, increasing the forms, increasing the number of applications that people have to fill in order now to comply with this yet another exemption.

So it is a step in the right direction, but, as we put more and more exemptions into the system, we demonstrate, I think, the essential wrongness of the idea of withholding on savings and dividends.

I support the efforts of the Senator, and I hope that his amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. NICKLES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KASTEN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I point out to the Senator that under the bill, there is a $10 threshold level which gives banks and other savings institutions the option of not withholding unless aggregate annual interest exceeds this threshold. All we are doing is increasing that threshold from $10 to $100. I think there is presently a minimum amount of administrative overhead in the bill due to the $10 threshold and by increasing that threshold I do not think we will be increasing the paperwork.

Conversely, they can put this increased threshold in their computers and say that if an individual's interest payment on a quarterly basis is less than $25, no withholding will be withheld. I think that will greatly assist them in reducing the amount of nuisance paperwork. I think this expansion of the threshold will really be to the benefit of the banks and savings institutions.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment at the appropriate time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, let me commend the Senator from Oklahoma for what I think is a very constructive effort in trying to work something out with the chairman of the Finance Committee. Clearly, the issue of withholding of interest and dividends is the biggest issue in this bill. It is the one that gives most Senators the most problems.

Many of us, if we were able to have our wishes to the utmost, would not want to have any provision for withholding of interest and dividends.

On the other hand, we found ourselves in the Finance Committee with the duty, a duty that was imposed not by our own wishes but was imposed on us by the Congress as a whole. We had to come up with a figure, with a dollar amount. We had to come up with some $98 billion in increased revenue over a 3-year period of time.

Nobody likes to raise taxes. We like to reduce taxes. Most of us on this side of the aisle have been talking for as long as I have been here in the Senate about what we could do to bring taxes down, not what we could do to increase the revenues of the Federal Government.

When we were faced with the task of responding to the requirements of the budget resolution, we put together a package, and the package was not anything that delighted anybody. But one of the things we thought about was, is it possible to increase revenue without raising taxes? Is it possible to increase revenue without raising the taxes that are otherwise due and owing?

The answer to that question, in part, was, yes, it is. We could do it by collecting those taxes which already are due and owing from taxes. If we could do a better job of collecting taxes, we will not have to go so far in raising taxes.

Really, the issue that is involved in the whole question of the withholding of interest and dividends is whether or not we are going to accomplish that objective, whether or not we are going to attempt to meet the mandate that was given us through better collection procedures. That is what has been involved.

I know that the chairman of the Finance Committee has been working very hard, as has the President, as has our majority leader, in trying to keep this package together, because what is involved in this whole issue of dividends and interest is not just dividends and interest. It is a question of trying to keep together a package.

I was leaving the Capitol Building a couple of days ago and somebody said to me, "Is the package still together?"

Really, an amendment which would go right to the heart of the withholding question goes right to the heart of the package and goes right to the heart of our economic program. It goes right to the heart of whether or not we, on this side of the aisle, can do the job of leadership which the voters have given us to do. That is what is involved in this issue.

I want to express my admiration to the Senator from Oklahoma in going so far, in working with the Senator from Kansas, and accomplishing so much. The Senator from Oklahoma has much to take credit for, not only in achieving this amendment, which he will achieve, but also in, hopefully, saving this bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if there are no more requests for time—are there any more requests for time?

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back any remaining time.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this vote follow the vote on the Mitchell amendment when the voting begins at the hour of 7:30, unless that hour should be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask that it be in order to now recognize the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment I am about to offer be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

On page 509, strike out lines 14 through 16.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, this amendment is being offered by myself and Senator HOLLINGS. I want to point out that Senator HOLLINGS had a large part in the drafting of this amendment, particularly the section having to do with information reporting.

Mr. President, our amendment would strike the interest and dividend withholding provisions from this bill.

These provisions are not new to Congress. In 1980, an overwhelming majority of Republican and Democratic Senators defeated this proposal because it was simply not good public policy. Two years have passed, and nothing has changed. The problems with withholding are still unresolved.

If the Senate votes to mandate withholding a total of 400 million interest and dividend bearing accounts would be affected. Approximately half of these—that's 200 million accounts—would be entitled to exemptions. It is ironic that, at a time when Americans are demanding a reduction in the paperwork burden of Government regulations, we would vote to increase the flow of paper by approximately 200 million. And every time a new account is opened or stock is traded, another new form must be filed.

Mr. President, it is the low-income taxpayer who will bear the greatest burden of these withholding provisions. Even with the exemptions for the low-income and low-income elderly, the IRS will be over withholding on those who can least afford to give the Federal Government an interest-free loan. For example, married people under 65 with taxable income greater than $9,750 and less than $17,342 would be caught in an over withholding trap. Their income will be too high to qualify for the low-income exemption, but their tax liability is less than the 10 percent withheld.

The withholding trap also applies to those over 65. The American Association of Retired Persons opposes the Finance Committee withholding provision, because of the difficulties of locating and exempting all of the elderly Americans who deserve to be exempted.

There are many other technical problems with withholding that are difficult to solve. What do you do about the uncompetitive situation set up when one bank in town is exempted from withholding for a year or two, and another must comply immediately? What becomes of compounding interest and reinvested dividends? How would a financial institution allocate withdrawals that occur before a withholding date? The list goes on and on.

Despite all of the problems withholding would cause, there is still no incentive for the big cheaters to pay all their tax liability under this system. A taxpayer in the 50-percent marginal rate tax bracket with $1,000 in interest income would have $100 withheld. He would still owe $400 in taxes, but knowing that the IRS does not necessarily track this information, there is little incentive to report and pay this at the end of the year.

But Mr. President, the essence of the problem is that at a time when we are trying to encourage savings, at a time when we are trying to encourage investment, we are being asked to accept a provision which would undermine both.

If you want more of something in our economic system, you must provide an incentive. If you want less of something in our economic system, there are two things you can do: You can tax it, or you can regulate it.

Here we are, after adopting an economic recovery program designed to encourage savings, investment, risk taking, entrepreneurship, excellence, and accomplishment, turning around and attempting to pass a provision which, by taxing and regulating savings and dividends, will work to dampen that economic spirit and work as a disincentive toward savings and investment.

This provision goes in the opposite direction of all we have worked to achieve in the past year and a half. It is an unworkable, costly, burdensome, and counterproductive proposal, and I hope my colleagues will join me in voting for its defeat.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the cosponsor of this amendment. I thank him for his help and support.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin.

I ask unanimous consent that the following be added as cosponsors if they are not already listed: Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. EXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. FORD, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. SASSER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. RANDOLPH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, my amendment deletes from the bill the required withholding of 10 percent of interest and dividend income.

Withholding has been offered before. It has been defeated before and it should be defeated now. The withholding provision would be costly, discourage savings, and impose additional paperwork burdens at a time when we are trying to reduce paperwork, promote savings, and cut costs.

Financial institutions throughout the Nation are strapped, none more so than our saving and loans. To require withholding on interest and dividends could impose as much as $1.5 billion in additional costs on these already hard-pressed institutions.

While the institutions themselves would bear some of the expense, there is no question they would be forced to pass on a portion of the cost to their customers. So the withholding provision is a double-edged sword. While extra financial burdens jeopardize the standing of the institutions in which so many Americans invest the fruits of their livelihood, withholding will also cut into those individual livelihoods by adding higher service charges and greater interest rates on loans.

If the withholding provision promises hardship for financial institutions and their clients, it also undermines the effort to promote greater personal savings throughout the Nation. This administration has argued as an article of faith that we need to stimulate savings. Few would dispute the argument. Without savings, the Nation deprives itself of desperately needed capital upon which business and industry might draw for the kind of expansion and renewal necessary to create more jobs. The withholding feature of the bill, however, will tend to discourage savings. It would take money out of private hands, and deprive the capital markets of important sources of funds.

It is claimed that requiring withholding will yield $4.3 billion in additional revenues to the Government in 1983. Yet, only about $1.3 billion of that—less than one-third—is estimated to come from additional taxpayer compliance. The remainder would be derived from acceleration of tax payments—money that is eventually paid anyway. In order to collect something on the order of $1 billion in new revenues, the withholding provision would impose hundreds of millions in new costs on financial institutions and the American people.

Let us be realistic. Withholding is not necessary to increase compliance—the bill already does that, giving the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to require submittal of 1099 forms with tax returns. My amendment removes the discreation and makes the forms mandatory. This will insure that all interest and dividends paid are accounted for by the taxpayer to the IRS, and makes withholding an unnecessary burden.

The withholding proposal could have a direct, adverse impact on the elderly. They would be required to file a certificate with their financial institutions in order to demonstrate their exempt status, and prove they are elderly. Thus, withholding would foist upon senior citizens an affirmative act, another nagging burden as onerous to a frail individual as the overall withholding provision would be to troubled financial institutions.

Withholding is in this bill because administation chieftains would have us believe that there is some sort of conspiracy afoot to avoid these payments. I do not question the need to achieve full compliance with our tax laws. But the bill has compliance features enough already. Moreover, preliminary IRS figures for 1981 show a compliance rate of 89 percent for interest and 85 percent for dividends, admittedly not perfect, but certainly perfectable—and without recourse to a withholding scheme likely to spawn more questions about our tax laws, generally.

We do not need this withholding provision. We have affirmed that before, and we should reaffirm it now.

The withholding provision is not likely to be cost effective. It would not produce a flood of new revenues, but the revenues it would produce would come at substantial cost to both financial institutions and taxpayers.

At a time when we are searching for less complex tax laws, withholding would sew another costly administrative patch on the crazy quilt of the Federal Tax Code. I hope my colleagues will join in supporting my amendment to strike the withholding provision from the bill.

Mr. President, the purpose of withholding is to bring about compliance with our tax laws. At the present time, we have 89 percent tax compliance of those receiving interest income and 85 percent compliance for those receiving dividend payments. So the gimmick here is to pick up the additional 11 to 15 percent. Fundmental to the collection of income taxes is the filing of the W-2 form. We have 98.7 percent compliance with that filing of the W-2 form. So it is only reasonable to assume that if we require the 1099 form to be filed with the individual's tax return, that would bring about full compliance. That is what we have done as cosponsors of this measure.

We are not trying to help evade taxes or avoid compliance. Our amendment makes mandatory the filing of the 1099 forms. Under the Finance Committee bill, it is discretionary and could be required by the rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is mandated by this amendment.

Once we have mandatory filing, in essence, we have collected $1.3 billion. That is really the only additional amount of money collected under the bill. I learned this on the Committee on the Budget some years ago, because this has been in course now for about 6 years: They have an "exaggeration" requirement at the Treasury Department. Every Secretary of the Treasury comes forward and says we are going to collect billions of dollars if we just have tax withholding on interest and dividends. The fact of the matter is that Treasury itself has stated that 75 percent of that $4.3 billion estimated for 1983 by the Finance Committee is really accelerated payments and not new money.

So, in reality, Mr. President, we are trying to collect some $1.3 billion. As I stated just a moment ago, under the compliance section in our amendment, we get that $1.3 billion. Assuming the accuracy of the Finance Committee's and Senator DOLE's argument—which I am sure he will make—you will find that what we get from this withholding provision is $1.3 billion at best. This does not really put the Finance Committee bill out of whack, because, as reported, it exceeds the reconciliation instruction. But we are not relying on that cushion. I reemphasize the compliance section.

If we look, then, at the accelerated payments going in to the Government, what we would be doing, in essence, is taking $3 billion out of capital markets that is really immediately reinvested. Some 2 million investors receiving interest and dividends immediately reinvest. So it is reasonable to assume that that $3 billion interest-free loan that would go to the Government would be taken out of the capital market and could not be reinvested.

I plead with my colleagues to understand this measure, because it is not good Finance Committee legislation. It is a very poor bill. Senator DOLE himself and many others said so just 2 years ago in Senate Concurrent Resolution 92.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Concurrent Resolution 92, of the 2d session of the 96th Congress, with a list of cosponsors, as reported by the Finance Committee, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

(Mr. RUDMAN assumed the Chair.)

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 92

Declaring that the Congress does not favor the withholding of income tax on interest and dividend payments

Mr. Chafee (for himself, Mr. Dole, Mr. Lugar, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. DeConcini, Mr. Hatch, Mr. Durkin, Mrs. Kassebaum, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Tower, Mr. Humphrey, Mr. McClure, Mr. Cochran, Mr. Church, Mr. Helms, Mr. Pressler, Mr. Ford, Mr. Garn, Mr. Randolph, Mr. Danforth, Mr. Hayakawa, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Pryor, Mr. Zorinsky, Mr. Hatfield, Mr. Mathias, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Young, Mr. Schmitt, Mr. Cohen, Mr. Heinz, Mr. Roth, Mr. Laxalt, Mr. Durenberger, Mr. Baker, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Warner, Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Stone, Mr. Percy, Mr. Glenn, Mr. Leahy, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Bumpers, Mr. McGovern, Mr. Tsongas, Mr. Schweiker, Mr. Hart, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Boren, Mr. Metzenbaum, Mr. Melcher, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Williams, Mr. Levin, Mr. Gravel, Mr. Nelson, Mr. Riegle, and Mr. Bentsen) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

July 23 (legislative day, June 12), 1980. Reported by Mr. Long, without amendment.

Declaring that the Congress does not favor the withholding of income tax on interest and dividend payments.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the enactment of a withholding tax on interest and dividend payments would be detrimental to the economic well-being of the United States.

DISAPPROVAL OF WITHHOLDING ON INTEREST AND DIVIDENDS

July 23 (legislative day, June 12), 1980.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Long, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following.

Report—To accompany S. Con. Res. 92

The Committee on Finance, to which was referred the resolution (S. Con. Res. 92) with respect to declaring that the Congress does not favor the withholding of income tax on interest and dividend payments, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon without amendment and recommends that the resolution be agreed to.

I. SUMMARY

Under present law, there is no withholding on interest and dividends paid to U.S. investors. Earlier this year, the administration recently proposed that these types of payments be subject to withholding. This resolution would express that it is the sense of the Congress not to favor the withholding of income tax on interest and dividend payments.

H. GENERAL DISCUSSION OF THE RESOLUTION

Present law

Under present law, there is no withholding on the interest and dividends of U.S. investors. While not subject to withholding, most interest and dividend payments must be reported by the payor to the recipient and to the Internal Revenue Service.

ADMINISTRATION PROPOSAL

The Administration has proposed a broad-based program of withholding on interest and dividend payments at a rate of 15 percent. Generally, the proposal would require withholding on payments by commercial, industrial, and financial institutions (and similar organizations) to individuals, partnerships, and certain trusts. Individuals who reasonably expect to be wholly free from tax liability would be exempt from withholding. (These individuals would file an exemption certificate with the interest and/or dividend payor.) The proposal also contemplates that the Secretary of the Treasury would have authority to prescribe regulations implementing additional individual exemptions from withholding, taking into account both the burden on withholding agents and the needs of individuals subject to withholding.

ESTIMATED REVENUE EFFECT OF THE ADMINISTRATION PROPOSAL

The Administration proposal would increase receipts by $3.4 billion in fiscal year 1981. Of this, $2.4 billion would be attributable to a speedup of collections which would otherwise occur in fiscal year 1982. (These estimates, however, do not take account of exemptions which have been proposed by the Administration subsequent to its original proposal.)

COMMITTEE RESOLUTION

Since the current system of withholding on wages and salaries was initiated, there have been several proposals for extending withholding to interest and dividend payments. The Committee has never approved such proposals in the past and it is the judgment of the Committee that it will not approve any such proposal now. The Committee is concerned that the proposal to withhold income tax on interest and dividend payments could work hardships on those individuals least able to afford them, such as retirees who depend on social security and dividend and interest income. In addition, the Committee believes that the proposed exemptions from withholding, which are designed to make the system more equitable, would make the withholding system unacceptably cumbersome and costly to administer. Because of these concerns, the Committee has reported this resolution which affirmatively states that it is the sense of the Congress that the enactment of a withholding tax on interest and dividend payments would be detrimental to the economic well-being of the United States.

III. VOTE OF THE COMMITTEE IN REPORTING THE RESOLUTION

In compliance with paragraph 7(c) of Rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the following statement is made relative to the vote by the Committee to report the resolution.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 92) was ordered favorably reported by voice vote.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, if you look at that list, you will find my authority. The chairman of the Finance Committee himself, and almost 60 Senators at that time cosponsored that resolution opposing the recommendation of President Carter. How is it that what was outrageous and untenable, unwise, and fiscally unsound under President Carter now constitutes great wisdom under President Reagan?

The cost in actually instituting a withholding system for the banks, the savings and loans, the credit unions, and other financial institutions will be some $1.5 billion. Another $500 million per year will be needed to maintain liquidity in the financial system. So, again looking at it fiscally, as a budgeteer would, what we are doing is costing the Treasury some $2 billion to collect $1.3 billion, when that $1.3 billion could be collected simply by the compliance section being mandated in our amendment.

The bottom line, as Senator KASTEN has pointed out, is that this withholding system will add to the bureaucracy. It is astonishing that an administration elected to diminish regulation, and reduce Government intrusion in private endeavor, is now proposing to add more bureaucracy, more regulation, and more intrusion. The fact is that there are 88 million savings accounts in commercial banks; 34 million time deposits; 6 million interest/bearing transaction accounts—like NOW accounts; 100 million stockholder and bondholder accounts; 90 million savings and loan accounts; millions of credit union accounts; and over 170 million savings bonds that are redeemed each year. The list does not stop there.

If we are going to have to pay these additional costs, if we are going to have to set up an account when somebody comes in with a savings bond you are going to refuse to cash the savings bond. This has not really been thought through. The burden has been on the committee to find some $20 to $25 billion and they are trying to take credit for it with the so-called $3 billion on the withholding amendment. I say take credit for the $1.3 billion that could actually be applied to the deficit by only accepting the compliance part of this amendment.

There is the argument. I guess I will hear it and I will be able to argue at the time, that here you have the wage earners subjected to withholding taxes and only the fat cuts are not going to have the withholding.

Of course, that is totally inaccurate. On the one hand, fat cats do pay taxes. They are the ones hiring all the accountants. They make their estimated returns and they make them quarterly, so in reality you already have withholding on the so-called fat cats.

But what this particular measure will affect is the relatively modest income person with savings in a savings and loan, credit union, or small bank savings account. This bill will impose an extra burden on them.

I am glad to try to propose an answer to that particular argument, but more than anything else you turn around by 180 degrees the policy of trying to promote savings as was emphasized by the Senator from Wisconsin. The year before last we exempted $200 of interest and dividend income for the individual, $400 for a couple, from income tax payments. We wanted affirmative action to promote saving in this country. And here now in a very callous fashion, with the added bureaucracy—uneconomical, burdensome, and intrusive—they are going to add this withholding scheme at the cost of $2 billion in order to get $1.3 billion in additional revenue.

Mr. President, I plead with my colleagues that this is unsound and unwise policy. Let us not go overboard in trying to find additional revenues with an entirely new bureaucratic system when the revenues could easily be reached by increased compliance simply by filing, as we do the W-2 form, the 1099 form when you pay your income tax. That is required by the amendment, and I urge its support.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I think I pretty well stated my views on the subject in connection with the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I would just like to state very briefly that this is truly a killer amendment. This is an amendment which would kill the bill, I think. That is, something like $12 billion I believe is involved in this, a very substantial part of the total bill.

I must say I admire those who have offered the bill because what an awesome responsibility to assume not only for the question of taxation of interest and dividends but for the bill itself, and maybe in a larger sense for the economy of this country.

This particular provision in the bill is not one which increases the tax liability of anybody. It is simply a provision to assure that taxes that are due and owing will be collected.

It seems to me that it is much preferable to collect taxes which are due and owing than to increase the tax liability of people, particularly at a time of recession.

But for those who say, "Well, if we raise revenue, fine; we are all for raising revenue; we realize under the budget resolution we have to raise revenue, but do not do it this way," I can tell Senators that in the Finance Committee we would have appreciated their thoughts on how to raise the revenue during the consideration of this matter 2 weeks ago.

Mr. President, I yield now 5 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I have worked closely with the chairman of the Finance Committee on the problem of tax compliance since last December, to come up with methods to collect revenue before we talked about raising taxes on particular groups of people or the public in general. In early March Senator DOLE and I introduced the Tax Compliance Improvement Act. We included sections that would attempt to recover unreported interest and dividend income. I think they are good provisions that Senator DOLE and I thought would accomplish the goals that we wanted to accomplish.

At the time we introduced the bill, we knew they would not bring in the amount of revenue that withholding would yield. We set objectives in that bill that were unrelated to revenue targets. We hoped we could accomplish what withholding would accomplish at a slower pace. Now, we needed more revenue for this bill to comply with the budget resolution. We had to measure all of those things.

We decided to support withholding in this instance because it would bring in more revenue and it would lessen the tax gap to a greater extent.

This is not a position we relish because, quite frankly, we would like to have people who have income from interest and dividends complying with the tax laws to the same extent that working men and women with wage withholding comply—that is 99-percent compliance. How do I as a member of the Finance Committee justify 11-percent noncompliance on interest income when we only have 1-percent noncompliance on wages?

How do I justify to the working men and women of my State, who have 99-percent compliance, that it is all right for 15 percent of the tax on dividends to go uncollected and unreported?

How can I justify that we have $4.1 billion of unreported, uncollected tax from interest and $3.6 billion of uncollected tax on dividends when the working men and women of this country who have their wages withheld are having taxes collected on 99 percent of their income?

This is a matter of fairness. It is a matter not just a question of raising money rather it is a matter of treating various categories of income equally and collecting taxes owed. It is just that plain and simple.

I could stand here and argue in good faith with good points as did the Senator from Missouri, this is the heart of the tax bill and if this provision is defeated perhaps our whole effort of economic revitalization will fall also. This bill is very important to reducing the deficit, but that is not the most important aspect of this legislation.

We are trying to bring fairness and equity to the tax policies of the Federal Government. We do not have fairness and equity now. This will bring more equity. It will bring more justice. It also adds in $4½ billion to our revenue targets, one-fourth of what we need in the first year. This is very important. It is a large chunk of money. I think each one of us ought to ask, Where is that money going to come from if we defeat this provision?

On whom are you going to impose a new tax to raise that amount of money? How are you going to justify raising a new tax or imposing a new tax when in fact we are not collecting the taxes that are already owed and that everybody agrees should be paid and that is simply unreported income?

That is where we are with this amendment, and that is why I am supporting it.

I have gotten here, first of all, by trying to do it by increased tax compliance. That would bring in a lot of revenue but not as much as this will bring in. What we are after now will accomplish two goals—equity and fairness—and this is the way to accomplish it.

Requiring withholding on interest and dividends is an action the Senate Committee on Finance took with great reluctance. The Internal Revenue Service estimates that 15 percent of dividend income and 11 percent of interest income is not reported. This contrasts with a 99 percent reporting rate for wages, which are withheld by Federal law. Faced with this problem, the committee adopted withholding on interest and dividends.

While drafting our compliance bill, Senator DOLE and I were confronted by these serious noncompliance statistics. We attempted to draft a more narrow solution to the problem based on the information provided by the Internal Revenue Service. The majority of interest income that is inaccurately reported stems from two basic causes. If the taxpayer provides an inaccurate social security number to the financial institution or the payor of interest, a mismatch occurs because of the inaccurate number. Our bill requires the taxpayer to be notified that a bad number has been reported to the Internal Revenue Service and gives the taxpayer 7 days to correct the mistake. If the mistake is not corrected, the payor would be ordered by the Internal Revenue Service to begin withholding on the account. The second reason the Internal Revenue Service is unable to match interest income to a taxpayer's return is that the taxpayer has not provided a social security number. Our bill would impose a penalty on a payor of interest who accepts an account without receiving a taxpayer identification number. We felt these provisions narrowly addressed the immediate problem and would raise enough money to improve compliance substantially.

Nevertheless, the huge revenue estimate for instituting a system of withholding on interest and dividend payments compelled the committee to take this action rather than choose other alternatives that would actually increase taxes on individuals.

While mandatory withholding has always been controversial, this provision was drafted in an attempt to alleviate as much hardship as possible. Banks and savings and loan associations would be permitted to elect to defer withholding on payments of interest until the last day of the year in which they made interest payments as long as the account's balance did not fall beneath the reporting threshold. This would free financial institutions from initiating complicated withholding systems to be triggered as often as interest is paid to their depositors. This alternative requires only an annual calculation by the bank if the depositor keeps his or her money with the same financial institution.

Furthermore, the committee provided exemptions to certain individuals, some to be obtained by filing an exemption certificate with the payor, and other exemptions to be granted as a matter of statutory right. Low-income individuals who had tax liability of less than $600—$1,000 for joint returns—in the preceding year may be exempt from withholding upon the filing of a certificate. Also, elderly taxpayers with tax liability of less than $1,500, or $2,500 if they file a joint return, may also be exempt from withholding upon the filing of an exception certificate. If a couple is married and either spouse is 65 or over, the couple would be considered exempt from the withholding requirement. According to the committee staff, if a couple files a joint return using the standard deduction, they will be exempt from withholding unless their income exceeds $22,214 using the 1982 tax rates. It is the committee's intention to try to exempt as many elderly and low-income individuals as possible and we have succeeded in exempting 90 percent of the elderly. Another class of exempt taxpayers would be those who receive payments by consumer cooperatives. Also, payments on small amounts of interest on U.S. savings bonds would be exempt from withholding if the payment of interest is $10 or less for the year. Payments by small financial institutions may also be exempt from the withholding requirements as described above. These provisions are designed to eliminate the harsh operation of instituting a withholding system on interest and dividends. It is the committee's hope that a carefully crafted provision with sensible exemptions will create optimal compliance and minimal administrative burdens.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas believes he can stand here and advocate this amendment because I advocated it in 1976, along with Senators LONG, PACKWOOD, ROTH, DOMENICI, HOLLINGS, STEVENS, CRANSTON, PROXMIRE, KENNEDY, HART, WEICKER, PELL, and STAFFORD. We are Senators who were here in 1976 who supported a 15-percent withholding.

I am surprised that the Senator from South Carolina has changed his mind, because we have all these exemptions built in to limit the impact of the provision.

It seems to me that if we want the centerpiece of this package to go down the drain, a $12 billion provision, if we want to excuse some people from paying taxes in America, then we can kill this provision in the bill.

I know all the pressure that is coming from the big banks. But I would note that the top 20 banks in this country paid taxes of less than 0.2 of 1 percent on $2 billion last year. They should be trying to help us collect money from people who do not pay taxes before we try to impose a tax on someone else.

I know all about the pressures and all about the lobbies. But having voted in 1976 for 15 percent withholding, I think I can stand here now with some credibility. That amendment in 1976 was rejected by a vote of 35 to 55. There were 35 Senators who supported that amendment, and 14 are still in the Senate.

The economic policy of the President of the United States is on the line, I say to my Republican colleagues. Our ability to lead in this country is on the line—the Republican Senate.

In November 1980, the American people said, "Let's give the Republicans a chance." A chance to do what? To try to balance the budget. To try to stop runaway spending. To try to bring down interest rates. To try to get the country back on the right track.

I think this is a test of leadership for the Republican Party. It is also a test of leadership in the area of tax reform. Do we want tax reform or do we want to talk about tax reform?

Believe me, putting this package together was not easy. I want to extend credit where credit is due, to the six Republicans on that committee who are running for reelection in 1982—in vote after vote for tax reform, they had the will to take on the big interests of America.

I guess we cannot satisfy everyone. I know that some people have legitimate concerns about this amendment.

Maybe I am prejudiced, but again I will stake my credibility on it, that I voted for withholding, for 15 percent, and for no exemptions, and so did the Senator from South Carolina, who is here tonight trying to wreck the package—a man who advocated $180 billion in new taxes during consideration of the budget resolution. Where will new taxes come from? You may try to do away with the third year, or wreck the President's program. Now we are asked to follow the Senator from South Carolina tonight in an effort to wreck the President's program.

Believe me, it is frustrating trying to raise $100 billion. I say to my Republican colleagues that this is our test. We will have some Democratic support, for which I am thankful. We have Democrats who are interested in tax reform. This is a fairness package. It is a package on which we spent months and months.

I talked to the President about withholding. He said, "What is wrong with withholding on dividends and interest?" Why should not people pay taxes? Why should 13 percent and 19 percent not pay taxes on interest and dividend income?

Why should anybody ask your neighbor or my neighbor or somebody in your State or my State to pay more taxes because somebody does not report interest and dividends?

The compliance rate of working people is 99 percent. Taxes are taken right out of their checks, and they should be here screaming for this amendment. It is not the working people of America who are worrying about tax evasion. It is not low-income Americans. It is the people with some means who are investing and have dividends and interest and do not pay taxes.

I wish to pay tribute to the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY). When we introduced the Grassley-Dole measure in March of this year, a lot of people said, "It is a public relations gimmick. They are going to have a big press release." We had a big press conference, and I guess a lot of people said, "That's never going anywhere. It is just talk about tax compliance."

However, in this provision, because of the interest of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, we are picking up $30 billion in tax compliance. We are picking up another $28 billion in closing loopholes. That is 60 percent of the 98.3 percent. Also, in many other areas we are going after people who should have been gone after a long time ago. Some are mistakes made in the bill last year and some were made 5, 10, 15, or 20 years ago.

I say to my colleagues that this is a test of leadership. I am not trying to scare any Democrats away from efforts to defeat this proposal, but the Republicans are the majority party.

The President has worked hard to get this package passed. He has made phone calls and has had private visits, which he should do. But if anyone thought the President was backing away from this package, I think that has been laid to rest.

I know of all the objections to withholding. I remember 1976. I have some great speeches made by Senators which I should like to read, but we do not have time.

The distinguished former chairman of the committee, Senator LONG, made a great speech on the merits of withholding. Others made good speeches in 1976 on the merits of withholding. They are very good. They convinced me. [Laughter.] There I was, a member of the minority party, voting with the Democrats for withholding, because it was right.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on my time?

Mr. DOLE. I will yield on my time.

Mr. LONG. Permit me to say to my distinguished colleague that I have been on both sides of that issue, so I guess I can support the arguments on both sides of it now. I appreciate the fine argument the Senator has made.

Mr. DOLE. I am reminded of the old saying: Some of my friends are for it, and some of my friends are against it, and I am going to stick with my friends. [Laughter.]

I know how the PAC's are out there working—the Political Action Committees—the bank PAC's. If I paid as little taxes as banks in this country, I would be up here saying we should have this measure; because if we do not get it—this is not a threat—we are going to be $12 billion short, and between now and the time we finish this bill tonight, we will have to find a way to pick up the $12 billion.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. I am not as familiar with this as is the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Louisiana and others who have been on the Finance Committee.

Is this a similar proposal to that which was made 2 or 3 years ago by the previous administration?

Mr. DOLE. In that case, it was 15 percent. It did not have the exemptions that this provision has. It did not have the $100 floor that the Senator from Oklahoma has included.

I think there are some rather major differences.

Mr. DECONCINI. I cannot remember the exact date. Was that roughly 3 years ago?

Mr. DOLE. It seems so long. I cannot remember when President Carter was here.

Mr. DECONCINI. I just wonder if the Senator has the number of Republicans who voted in opposition to that effort that was put forth by the Carter administration. I know as a Democrat I voted against it to my best recollection because I thought it was a mistake then.

Mr. DOLE. I will be happy to furnish that for the RECORD and put the vote in the RECORD along with the vote in 1976.

Mr. DECONCINI. That will be helpful.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD that material.

(The material will be supplied for printing in tomorrow's RECORD.)752-753S

Mr. DOLE. I believe there are major differences between that provision and the provision before us now and there have been major changes made to satisfy some of the real concerns; and there are real concerns.

But I ask those who are going to vote against the package to explain why Americans who do not pay taxes should not pay their taxes. If we are not going to withhold from the rich people why should we withhold from the working man and woman. Maybe we should repeal the withholding tax.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. I wonder if the Senator asked the same question when it was before us proposed by the Carter administration.

Mr. DOLE. I may have. I voted for it in 1976. That was before the Carter administration. I do not want to get into all that. I wish to finish my statement. I doubt that many votes are going to be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, 7:30 p.m. having arrived, the Senate will now vote in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we defer that procedure until we finish the debate on this amendment and then we can have three votes back to back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, while the Senator from Kansas was gone, out of respect for another Senator speaking to me, when I was sitting in the Senator's chair with one of the staff, Senator METZENBAUM asked, and I gave him my word, that there would be no unanimous-consent while he was gone for a period of time.

So I do not care what action the Senator takes, but I should bring that to his attention.

Mr. DOLE. I do not think the Senator from Ohio will object.

Let me suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Ohio has no problem with this. I think what he is concerned with is some unanimous-consent request on time limits or on some amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for 1981 the preliminary study of income and current Federal taxes for large commercial banks shows the following:

Total results for 18 large banks show an income of $3,378,066,000. Their consolidated income—U.S. source only—was about $2.03 billion. They paid about a minus $5,565,000 in taxes. The tax rate on U.S. and foreign source income is minus 0.2 percent. The tax rate on U.S. source income was minus 0.3 percent.

Mr. President, I know there are other Members who wish to speak on this amendment. I do not want to take all the time.

Again I say it is a very important amendment. It is a key to this entire Finance Committee package.

I say to my colleagues I hope they have some confidence in what we did in the Finance Committee and I hope that the amendment will be defeated and that we will adopt the provision in the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the question of whether Federal income tax should be withheld from interest and dividend earnings is a very close issue.

When a similar but more far-reaching proposal was put forward by other administrations, I opposed it. My opposition to the measure at that time was based in part on the additional regulatory burden imposed on depository institutions. In addition, I was especially concerned that persons who had no tax liability and who might not otherwise have to file a tax return, particularly low-income and elderly persons, would be required to do so in order to secure a refund of taxes withheld from their savings. The proposal now before the Senate does not have these major flaws.

With the report of the Reagan administration, the Senate Finance Committee has recognized the problems inherent in this proposal and has established six exceptions to the withholding requirement imposed by this bill. Specifically, there are exceptions for:

First, payments to certain low income and elderly individuals;

Second, payments to other exempt recipients such as corporations and nominees;

Third, certain payments by consumer cooperatives;

Fourth, payments of small amounts of interest on U.S. savings bonds;

Fifth, at the election of the payor, payments which would aggregate less than $100 during the taxable year, if made on an annual basis; and Sixth, payments by certain small financial institutions exempted by regulations issued by the Secretary.

The reporting requirements of this bill are not substantially different from those now required of institutions paying interest and dividends. Currently, a form 1099 must be issued showing the amount of interest on dividends paid to each recipient. The additional task of withholding 10 percent of the amount paid and remitting this to the IRS in this era of computerized, electronic data processing should not be unreasonable. The alternative means of insuring that interest and dividend income is reflected on tax returns would be for the IRS to audit each and every return. It is obvious that this would be an extremely costly, time consuming, and intrusive process that would be opposed by virtually all taxpayers.

The case for withholding is based on the premise that no one has the right to cheat on taxes. To the extent that persons do not pay taxes which they are legally obligated to pay based on interest, dividend, and other income, the tax burden on honest taxpayers is increased. The administration and, especially the Treasury Department, strongly contend that this withholding proposal, with its protections for senior citizens, low income persons, and small financial institutions, is reasonable and a necessary tax compliance tool. While I continue to harbor some doubts about the wisdom of the proposal, I am willing to support it at this time in order to ascertain whether the worthwhile objective behind it can be achieved without an undue burden on those affected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may need to the Senator from Iowa, the cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, first of all, I wish to commend and thank my good friends, Senator DOLE and Senator GRASSLEY, for their hard work on this bill. I agree with just about everything that Senator DOLE said just a few minutes ago. In fact the Senator from Kansas and I agree most of the time on most things. On this particular issue, however, I must say that it is my opinion that the Finance Committee has overestimated the underreporting of interest and dividends currently. I oppose the committee proposal and respectfully submit the following four points for Senate consideration:

First. The committee proposal groups millions of the elderly and family savers in this country with the thousands who are purposely evading taxes. All people affected by the committee action have their interest and dividends reported to the IRS on 1099 forms each and every year. Therefore, I believe the committee is grossly overestimating the amount of revenue to be collected.

Second. Financial institutions are already required to notify the Internal Revenue Service of interest and dividends paid.

Third. Imposition of withholding will impose a substantial cost for financial institutions. There are costs associated with implementing a new system, costs associated with not having the withheld money in their accounts, and there are costs associated with determining the exemptions for the elderly and the low income contained in the legislation. Under the terms of the proposal all savings and banking institutions would have to have a crystal ball and a crew of detectives to comply with the withholding parameters.

Mr. President, we have here an example of more Government redtape, more Government paperwork, all of which is nonproductive and a further drag on our economy.

Fourth, and finally, Mr. President, individuals are going to be the big losers, as they always are, when individuals, lose the use of their own money; as they will under the committee proposal. The IRS is already receiving $50 billion per year excess money. They call it a float over at the Treasury. The float is a result of overwithholding. In many cases the Government has this extra money for as long as 18 months to 2 years—interest free.

In conclusion Mr. President, I suggest that extending withholding to interest and dividends will compound Government regulation and bureaucracy levy more redtape, and result in more nonrecoverable expenses and overhead for the taxpaying, law abiding businessmen and women and the financial institutions they manage.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Kansas and I did have that provision in 1976. But we have learned over a 6-year period not to rely on Secretaries of the Treasury when they are looking for revenues, and thereby I opposed it in 1978, I opposed it in 1980, and I oppose it in 1982.

I had the distinguished Senator from Kansas support, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, and the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who now calls it a killer amendment on July 22, 1982, but who, on May 6, 1980, thought it was most justifiable and very much needed.

I put in the RECORD his resolution. They would not even wait for the measure to come up on a Finance Committee bill, but they put it in with some 60 cosponsors—we can call the names, they are in the RECORD here. They are all vacillating around here and addressing those things that are not involved, No. 1.

The Finance Committee bill has not made the 1099 form mandatory, but only optional as required by the Secretary of Treasury. We have made the filing of the 1099 forms mandatory in our amendment. So when the Senator from Missouri starts talking about collecting taxes which are rightfully owed, I agree with him. That is exactly what we want, and that is what our amendment will do.

When the Senator from Iowa talks about fairness, that is exactly what we want, and that is why I have the increased compliance in the amendment. But what we want is fairness to the small institutions and freedom from the bureaucracy, just what the Senator from Iowa was elected upon. You are turning 180°. You are reregulating everybody. You have $2 billion in regulations and over 400 million forms. You are going to add 400 million forms at a cost of $2 billion just to collect $1.3 billion in revenues.

The Secretary of the Treasury testified to the Finance Committee that 75 percent of the $4.3 billion was accelerated payments, not new money, to satisfy Senator DOMENICI's deficit. So let us get our figures straight. Do not come out here wandering around talking about $12 billion, and my amendment being a killer amendment.

I joined the Senator from Iowa, I voted against Senator MATTINGLY from Georgia, his amendment when he tried to take out the compliance.

I am for fairness. I am for tax payment, and we have got it in this amendment.

If you want to snooker around with the Secretary of Treasury, then go ahead and vote against this particular amendment, but do not come up here and use vague figures of 13 and 19 percent. The Senator from Iowa used the accurate figure, 11 percent.

We are limited on time. I could go down the list, but I can tell you this about taking on the big interests. We have got the small people. The big interests, the "fat cats" are estimating their taxes. This amendment is for the little people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further time to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KASTEN. How much time is there remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes.

Mr. KASTEN. I would be happy to yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I would like to thank the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from South Carolina.

I would just like to say, of course, I do favor the compliance improvements in this bill, and I also favor this amendment that is being put forward by us.

Just to clarify a couple of things, I think we are all against tax cheaters. But how do you separate compliance from coercion? I think that is the question. I think what was written into the Finance Committee bill is more coercion than it is trying to get compliance. I have felt strongly all along that if the 1099 form used social security numbers, if we mandate that they use social security numbers, there would be no problems for the IRS to crosscheck. That is how you get compliance.

IRS does have a duty, and if the correct numbers were put on the 1099's we would have no problem in getting that money.

I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, just one question about which I am not quite clear. In the first year what percent of the money are we taking in that the Senator says we would take in is acceleration versus money that we would normally get if everybody complied?

Mr. DOLE. In the first year it is two-thirds acceleration, one-third compliance. Then it reverses in the outyears.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I guess that is one of my points. I think we ought to write language in the bill to get the one-third and not go out and accelerate the money from everybody's paycheck into the Federal Government. So that is one of the main reasons why

I do rise and support this amendment because I think it is fair.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Georgia.

There are a large number of individuals and groups who would come forward in support of this amendment. I would like to just bring to the attention of the Senate that the National Association of Mutual Savings Banks says:

Withholding will take billions of dollars directly out of the savings flow and will be a major disincentive to personal savings.

Accordingly, and on behalf of the 3 savings banks in Wisconsin and their 22,000 account holders, we urge you to support the Kasten/Hollings amendment.

The Credit Union National Association says:

1. Withholding a portion of dividend and interest income could drive funds away from corporate equities, bonds, and other savings mechanisms.

2. Withholding would lower the real rate of return on some investments by denying investors the use of withheld funds. This could make investments less attractive.

3. Withholding would impose extensive operating cost burdens on savings institutions and increase paperwork burdens.

4. A better approach for improving compliance on interest and dividends would be to improve the information reporting system."

I would like to point out to the Members of the Senate that is exactly what this amendment would do.

The American Bankers Association says the following:

The proposal to impose withholding tax on interest and dividends is a disincentive to saving and investment that comes at a high cost to the public. The impact of withholding will reduce savers' and investors' earnings otherwise attained through reinvestment and compounding by an estimated $3 billion. Not only will savers and investors be deprived of this income, the Treasury will be deprived of up to $1 billion in taxes payable on those earnings.

If the purpose of withholding tax on interest and dividends is to increase compliance, the ABA believes that this purpose can be better accomplished, with far less cost and inconvenience to the public, through the broadened information reporting required by the taxpayer compliance provisions contained in H.R. 4961.

The American Association of Retired Persons says the following:

Withholding on interest and dividends. The Finance Committee bill would impose a 10 percent withholding requirement on interest and dividend payments. Although an exemption procedure will be created for low income elderly and for others who expect to have no tax liability, it will be the individual's responsibility to secure the exemption certificate and to forward it to the payor of interest or dividends.

We fear that the exemption process will frequently fail to operate properly, and a serious overwithholding problem will result. By placing the burden on the individual to exempt him/herself from withholding, the proposal brings many elderly people into the taxpaying system who have not been in it for years. This problem is further complicated by a January 1, 1983, effective date, which certainly is not sufficient time to get the word out about the exemption process.

We believe that a number of crucial questions regarding interest and dividend withholding remain unanswered. In addition to the workability of the entire exemption process, Congress has not addressed the question of the value of withholding on small accounts. Since many elderly savers are small savers, an automatic exemption for small accounts would lessen the likelihood of overwithholding. Also, considerable savings in administrative costs could be gained with this approach.

As the withholding proposal stands presently, we must oppose it. Too many elderly people rely on interest and dividend payments to meet daily living expenses for these changes to be hurried through Congress.

Mr. President, group upon group upon group of people oppose the concept of withholding on savings and dividends, and I hope this amendment will be agreed to.

I ask unanimous consent to have these letters printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS,
New York, N.Y., July 22, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr.,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KASTEN: During the Senate's consideration of HR. 4961, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, Senators Robert W. Kasten, Jr. and Ernest F. Hollings will offer an amendment to strike from the bill the provisions imposing withholding of taxes on interest and dividends.

The National Association of Mutual Savings Banks is strongly opposed to withholding at the source. Withholding will take billions of dollars directly out of the savings flow and will be a major disincentive to personal savings. Moreover, the massive computer reprogramming necessary for withholding, coupled with the difficulties in implementing an exemption system for certain accountholders, will require a lead time of at least nine months thereby greatly reducing the revenue impact in fiscal year 1983.

Accordingly, and on behalf of the 3 savings banks in Wisconsin and their 22,000 accountholders, we urge you to support the Kasten/Hollings amendment.

Sincerely,

SAUL B. KLAMAN,
President.

CREDIT UNION
NATIONAL ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Madison, Wis., July 21, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KASTEN: The Credit Union National Association supports your amendment to remove withholding of tax on interest and dividends from H.R. 4961, now before the Senate.

Some of the best arguments against withholding of taxes on interest earnings as proposed in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (H.R. 4961), are summarized in the Joint Committee on Taxation print (JCS 24-82). The print, prepared for the Committee on Finance, states:

"Arguments against the proposal:

"1. Withholding a portion of dividend and interest income could drive funds away from corporate equities, bonds, and other savings mechanisms.

"2. Withholding would lower the real rate of return on some investments by denying investors the use of withheld funds. This could make investments less attractive.

"3. Withholding would impose extensive operating cost burdens on savings institutions and increase paperwork burdens.

"4. A better approach for improving compliance on interest and dividends would be to improve the information reporting system."

The Credit Union National Association, Inc. (CUNA) is an association of credit union Leagues representing each State, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. Through the Leagues, CUNA represents over 20,000 federally and state chartered credit unions serving over 46 million members.

Credit unions now fully comply with the law in reporting interest and dividend earnings to both individuals and the IRS. Furthermore, CUNA has not objected to any of the provisions in the Dole/Grassley tax compliance bill, now a part of H.R. 4961, meant to close the compliance gap. The new compliance tools include:

Extension of reporting requirements to all interest bearing instruments.

New penalties for filing incorrect 1099 forms with the IRS.

Requiring persons filing large numbers of returns to file on magnetic tape and related formats.

Semi-annual compounding of interest on funds due the government. Presently simple interest is charged on over-due funds. (Ironically, withholding would deny taxpayers the benefits of compounding on the 10 percent tax withheld on interest earnings.)

Withholding on annuities, including IRAs, would be automatic upon distribution of funds (previously voluntary) unless the individual elects otherwise.

The establishment of a mandatory withholding system that would bathe taxpayers and businesses in a new set of government forms and procedures is unjustified and must be resisted until it is known that the above procedures have failed to bring compliance.

Requiring credit unions to withhold taxes on the earnings of our member/savers will cause the return on their savings to be reduced by the cost of administering such a program along with the direct loss due to the inability to compound those amounts forwarded to Treasury.

In light of the fact that two-thirds of the benefits to the government would come in a one-time acceleration of revenue, the costs imposed on credit unions and their members are unnecessary. As the accompanying brochure reveals, over 60 percent of credit unions have assets of less than $1 million. Requirements, such as withholding of taxes on interest and dividends, processing exemption certificates and other paperwork related to collecting taxes, will prove extremely burdensome on these institutions.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH N. CUGINI,
Chairman.

AMERICAN BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: The Senate Finance Committee approved the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Tax Act of 1982 (H.R. 4961) on Monday, July 12th. The full Senate may consider the bill next week. The bankers of the nation support efforts to move toward a more responsible Federal fiscal policy, including reductions in expenditures and necessary increases in taxes. Although other items in the bill increase the taxes banks pay and the operational costs they incur, the American Bankers Association accepts a special responsibility to bring to your attention one aspect of this measure that may have unanticipated adverse effects on the economy as a whole and on individual savers and investors.

The proposal to impose withholding tax on interest and dividends is a disincentive to saving and investment that comes at a high cost to the public. The impact of withholding will reduce savers' and investors' earnings otherwise attained through reinvestment and compounding by an estimated $3 billion. Not only will savers and investors be deprived of this income, the Treasury will be deprived of up to $1 billion in taxes payable on those earnings.

According to the United States Treasury, taxpayers are reporting 85 percent of interest and dividend income subject to reporting. When this compliance figure is compared with the approximately 75 percent of the individual income tax returns that generate tax refunds—over $53 billion for 1981—it indicates that most of the anticipated revenue gain from withholding results from a one-time cash flow surge in 1983 from accelerated collection of taxes. Most of this money will have to be refunded in fiscal year 1984. The Treasury Department's explanation of the initial withholding proposal in February confirms that three-fourths of the increased revenue for fiscal year 1983 is a "change in timing". It is, therefore, only a temporary increase in the cash flow from the taxpayers to the Treasury; not a real increase in revenue. This should not be accomplished at the expense of the overwhelming majority of individuals who save and invest and pay their taxes.

If the purpose of withholding tax on interest and dividends is to increase compliance, the ABA believes that this purpose can be better accomplished, with far less cost and inconvenience to the public, through the broadened information reporting required by the taxpayer compliance provisions contained in H.R. 4961. Such an approach avoids overwithholding and the reduction in yield which would result from withholding on accounts where interest is compounded frequently. It also avoids extending the intrusive presence of government regulations and forms into the daily lives of millions of savers and investors. Why should elderly individuals living on fixed incomes have to fill out exemption forms in order not to have those incomes diminished by a tenth? The ABA believes that it is premature to substitute a mandatory withholding system for a working information reporting system before we have seriously tried to improve our information system. The ABA pledges its cooperation with the IRS and the Treasury in developing an improved, more effective, and more efficient reporting system.

In addition to the impact of withholding on individuals, the proposed system of exemptions and exceptions creates a system of such complexity that neither the IRS, many of the financial institutions that pay interest, nor many of the corporations that pay dividends will be able to implement the system by January 1, 1983. The implementation of such a system requires not only legislation, but regulations and interpretations of those regulations that the Treasury Department likely will be unable to issue with sufficient lead time.

In addition to problems of complexity, financial institutions will be faced with substantial costs in designing and putting into place withholding systems to deal with the vast array of investments and financial services offered to the public. When one also considers the many personal interactions between individuals and their banks, the need to develop procedures and train employees to answer customers' questions and the need to communicate with customers about how the new system will affect them, it becomes clear that implementing a withholding system involves a great deal more than merely reprogramming a computer. Furthermore, it is a widespread misperception that a system of withholding can now be implemented with relatively little effort because of the increased use of the computer.

This proposal has been rejected repeatedly by the Congress whenever it has been proposed in the past. The ABA believes that the reasons for rejecting this proposal in the past remain sound. No new evidence has been brought forward to turn to a proposal regarded in the past as a bad idea into a good idea.

Sincerely,

WILLIS W. ALEXANDER.

CITIBANK,
New York, N.Y., July 22, 1982.

Re cost to the public of withholding on interest and dividends—over $3 billion per year.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Citibank urges you to oppose the provision in the Senate Finance Committee bill to impose withholding-at-source on interest and dividends. As indicated by the attached memorandum, it is estimated that the withholding proposal reported by the Senate Finance Committee in its tax increase bill on July 2 would cost the public probably more than $3 billion per year. These costs to the public are based upon two principal factors:

1. Withholding on interest would reduce savings due to the loss of interest compounding on amounts of tax withheld in subsequent quarters of each taxable year. Similarly, withholding on dividends on a quarterly or other short-period basis would reduce earnings on dividend amounts withheld, which would otherwise go into income-earning investments. It is estimated that the cost to the public due to reduced interest compounding and dividend reinvestment would be $1.7-2 billion annually.

2. The annual cost of administering withholding on interest and dividends, including processing exemption certificates, and greatly expanded information reporting, would impose heavy burdens on the financial sector. It is estimated that the administrative costs of withholding for the private sector would be at least $1.5 billion per year and probably more.

These costs would, of necessity, be passed on to depositors and investors in the form of lower interest payments, reduced dividends, extra service charges, special fees, etc. These increased costs to the private sector do not inclue the additional, extremely high annual costs to the Federal government for implementing withholding, or the huge cost of the additional paperwork burdens which would be imposed on the public—due to the exemption certificate and confirmation procedures required by the withholding provisions of the Senate Finance Committee bill.

It is apparent that the several differing revenue increase projections under the Senate Finance Committee proposal do not take these factors into account. Therefore, any revenue expected to be derived by the government from withholding would necessarily be directly, as well as indirectly, reduced by these costs.

It is respectfully urged that you consider these factors in assessing any proposal to impose withholding on interest and dividents.

Yours very truly,

JOHN F. ROLPH III,
Vice President, Tax Legislation.

COST TO THE PUBLIC OF WITHHOLDING ON INTEREST AND DIVIDENDS, CITIBANK, N.A., JULY 19, 1982

The proposed withholding of income tax from periodic interest payments would reduce the total amount of interest that people earn. That would happen because the withheld interest would not be available, as it now is, for compounding in future quarters. The amount would be in the neighborhood of $1.5 to 2 billion, before taking into account exemptions that may be provided and the amounts that people currently pay on interest and dividend income in their estimated-tax returns. In addition, compliance costs for banks and other institutions—which would be passed on to individuals in the form of reduced interest and higher service charges—probably would amount to about $1.5 billion. This brings the total cost of withholding to the public to around $3 billion per year.

The table lists estimates of outstanding household financial assets which would be subject to withholding under the current proposal.

Year-end 1981

Financial Assets:	Trillions
Interest-bearing checkable deposits	$0.1
Savings deposits	.3
U.S. Savings bonds	.1
Small time deposits	.9
Money market fund shares	.2
Large time deposits	.2
Short-term treasuries	.1
U.S. Agency issues	.1
Open market paper	(1)
Corporate and foreign bonds	.1
Long-term Treasuries	(1)
Corporate equities	1.1
Total interest bearing	2.0
Total equities	1.1
Total [2]	3.1

[1] Less than $50 billion.

[2] All figures are based on Federal Reserve data. Equities and bonds are at market value. The table excludes household-owned mortgages, municipals, and minor amounts of other interest-bearing assets.

To roughly estimate the interest and dividend income from these assets, one can use a weighted-average rate of return (at current interest rates) of 11 percent on the market value of interest-bearing assets and 6 percent of equities. This yields an income stream of about $220 billion on interest-bearing assets and roughly $65 billion on equities. So total interest and dividend income potentially subject to withholding is around $285 billion. This figure will, of course, rise in future years as people build up their holdings of deposits, securities and equities. It will fluctuate with interest rates, dividend payout, regulatory changes and shifts in the composition of assets. For convenience, we could assume interest and dividends of around $300 billion in 1983. Estimates by the Senate Finance Committee suggest that some $25 billion of interest income and some $10 billion of dividend income are not reported under the current system.

Tax withholding at a 10 percent rate would potentially extract from households about $30 billion per year. If households received and reinvested this sum of $30 billion, at an annual rate in the neighborhood of 11 percent, they would receive an interest income—in the absence of withholding—of approximately $1.7 billion. In other words, the $30 billion represented a "withholding fund" that the Treasury wants to extract from them. In the absence of withholding, this fund would begin at zero on the first of January and climb to $30 billion by the end of the year, for an average outstanding value of $15 billion, which would earn $1.7 billion if invested at 11 percent. Allowing for the inevitable estimating errors, it seems reasonable to put the potential income loss at $1.5 to 2 billion.

This is an estimate of the potential loss that people would suffer. The actual loss would be less, to the extent that households would receive exemptions from withholding, to the extent that households currently do not reinvest their interest and dividend income; and to the extent that households pay estimated taxes on a quarterly basis.

It's difficult to precisely estimate compliance costs for financial institutions. But Citibank's projections of its own cost factors indicate a startup cost—designing and installing new computer software, for example—of several million dollars. Much more troublesome, the running operating costs, year in and year out, for compliance with the proposed law are around $7 million per year.[1] The cost burden would be proportionately higher at some other lenders, proportionately lower at others. Citicorp, of course, accounts for only a small fraction of the $2 trillion in deposits and securities shown in the table—only about one half of one percent. Blowing up that $7 million to cover all those institutions and agencies that issue securities and offer deposits suggests a total, economy-wide compliance cost of around $1.5 billion.

These costs of administering withholding, reporting, and exemption procedures provided in the proposed law would not be borne by the shareholders of banks and corporations. These costs would be passed right on to the depositor and the investor in the form of lower interest payments, extra service charges, special fees, etc. Therefore, the visible, out-of-pocket, costs of withholding on interest and dividends would run around $3 billion. Much of this would be not just a redistribution of income at the expense of individuals but an extra layer of absolute inefficiency.

The cost of calculating individual income-tax liabilities—largely borne by individuals—would be larger than it is today. The proposal would create new costs in preparing and filing exemption statements, calculating and filing complicated withholding and information reports, and handling all those forms when they pour into the Treasury. The extra paperwork and computer-work imposed on individuals and on the Treasury is, of course, over and above the explicit, visible $3 billion.

[1] Another bank, First & Merchants National Bank of Richmond, with assets of $2.6 billion, estimates annual processing costs of $2.5 million.

U.S. LEAGUE OF SAVINGS ASSOCIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: The Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, H.R. 4961, recently reported by the Finance Committee, contains a matter of great concern to savings and loan associations, their savers and the investing public. Title III, Subtitle A, of that legislation would impose a requirement of 10 percent withholding on interest and dividends at source. This provision allegedly nets the Treasury $4.3 billion in increased revenues in fiscal year 1983.

The U.S. League of Savings Associations remains supportive of the Senate's resolve to put our Government's fiscal house in order and we stand ready to assist in responsible efforts to assure compliance with our federal tax laws. However, we must oppose the plan set forth in Title III, Subtitle A. Furthermore, we are obliged to bring to your attention serious questions about the accuracy of the revenue bonus projected under the 10 percent withholding-at-source plan advocated by Treasury and adopted by the Finance Committee. Because withholding is a disincentive to savings and investment, creates paperwork and customer relations problems for interest and dividend payors, and comes at a time of unstable economic conditions in the financial community, an accurate assessment of the real budgetary implications of this withholding plan should be available before the Senate votes on this proposal.

The advertised revenue gain from withholding of $4.3 billion for fiscal year 1983 is comprised of two parts: accelerated payments and increased compliance. According to the plan first proposed by the Treasury in February, approximately 75 percent of the first year's revenue gain comes from accelerated payments. In dollar terms, that amounts to over $3 billion of the alleged $4.3 billion revenue gain.

Is this withholding estimate realistic and will these anticipated accelerated payments in fiscal 1983 be forthcoming?

First, the Tax Bill itself delays withholding until January 1, 1983—three months into the fiscal year.

Second, institutions could not implement the plan until the issuance of essential Treasury regulations and interpretations. Without Treasury regulations and interpretations, an institution could not develop a workable withholding scheme. Once developed, an institution must then notify its depositors that withholding will occur, describe the mechanism it will employ, and respond to customer inquiries.

The sensitive nature of any withholding scheme and its attendant customer relations difficulties make it clear that withholding involves a great deal more than reprogramming a computer. Therefore, even after enactment and issuance of Treasury regulations and interpretations, implementation of withholding will be delayed well into the 1983 fiscal year. As a result we estimate $2 billion of the $3 billion in accelerated payments will be lost for fiscal 1983.

Third, the remaining $1 billion of accelerated payments from withholding also seems to be inflated. Details now available indicate that depositories will have the option of withholding annually on passbook and NOW accounts. (Passbook and NOW accounts comprise over 20 percent of our total deposit base). Also, an escrow or "float" opportunity may be provided to offset institutional costs—which, in turn, reduces anticipated accelerated payments. Furthermore, small depositories may be exempted from the tax collection responsibility. Each of these features will erode the $1 billion bonus still available from tax accelerations.

Fourth, under the plan, individuals will be able to reduce their estimated tax payments (if applicable) by the amount of taxes withheld from their interest and dividend income. Also, because of a provision in the 1981 Economic Recovery and Tax Act, wage earners are now permitted to reduce their wage and salary withholding based upon anticipated withholding from interest and dividend income. Surely we are obliged to inform out savers about these options, which, while reducing over-withholding by individuals, also means a reduction in accelerated revenues forecast by the Treasury.

The preceding points create a great deal of doubt whether any or all of the $3 billion in revenue acceleration from withheld taxes will indeed be forthcoming in fiscal year 1983. In addition, we estimate that a large portion of the increased compliance expected in 1983 ($1.3 billion) could be achieved by expanding the information reporting program (used since 1962 by depositories) to bearer obligations, as well as U.S. Treasury debt securities, as mandated elsewhere in H.R. 4961. We strongly support this long overdue expansion of the information return reporting coverage.

Thus, if support for withholding is solely based upon revenue considerations, all Senators should be aware that at least $3 billion—or 75 percent—of the expected revenue pickup from withholding in fiscal year 1983 will not be collectible.

The U.S. League urges your careful assessment of the revenue projections forecast for Title III, Subtitle A, of H.R. 4961 (as amended by the Finance Committee) before voting on this ill-conceived plan to boost tax collections from interest and dividend income sources.

Sincerely,

ROY GREEN,
Chairman

INVESTMENT COMPANY INSTITUTE,
Washington, D.C., July 15, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of 12 million mutual fund shareholders, the Investment Company Institute opposes the interest and withholding provisions of the Senate Finance Committee Tax Bill. The Institute joins other organizations, representing a variety of financial institutions and their millions of shareholders and depositors, in requesting that you not support the revival of the discredited idea of forcing financial institutions to withhold 10 percent of the dividends and interest due American investors and savers. Repeated consideration over the years has shown this proposal to be inequitable, costly, and inefficient.

Like previous withholding schemes on interest and dividends, the current proposal is inequitable because it will involve overwithholding in many cases. Despite plans to issue so-called exemption certificates, many taxpayers, particularly elderly persons of relatively modest means, will end up having to reclaim from the government, as long as a year after the fact, monies which never should have been withheld in the first place. In addition to the substantial hardships created for persons dependent on dividends and interest to meet current living expenses, there will be a loss of earnings to those taxpayers who would have reinvested the dividends and interest withheld from them. In 1981, this factor alone would have cost 12 million mutual fund investors over $110 million in dividends.

Withholding on interest and dividends will be costly because it will impose an enormous administrative burden on all financial institutions. It has been estimated that implementation of the withholding provisions will require the issuance and processing of over 400 million exemption certificates. Withholding from some accounts but not others (as well as monitoring for switches in category) will involve the installation of a complicated and expensive system which will be only partly susceptible to automated processing by computer. It has been estimated that in the mutual fund industry the additional costs of administration will be between $1.50 and $2.00 per account annually, in addition to very substantial installation costs. This could add as much as $36 million on an annual basis to the expenses of operating mutual funds—costs which will inevitably be borne by mutual fund shareholders.

Finally, the withholding scheme is inefficient in view of the revenues produced, the lost earnings to shareholders and depositors on monies withheld from them, the administrative costs of collection and the processing of exemptions and claims for refunds. It simply is not a cost efficient way of raising revenue.

In the past several years, great strides have been made by the Internal Revenue Service in administering the existing system of matching the information that lists the recipients of interest and dividends with the tax returns filed by these persons. All segments of the financial services industry have always been willing to discuss improvements in the present system designed to make tax evasion even more difficult. For example, the Institute earlier this year testified in support of a bill to withhold interest and dividends from accounts which fail to supply the IRS with taxpayer ID numbers. The adoption of a proposal would be much less costly and more efficient because it would focus precisely on the problem of tax evasion and provide a specific remedy for dealing with it. Unlike the withholding provisions of the Finance Committee Bill, it would not subject all American investors and depositors to a blunderbuss approach to snare a relative handful of tax delinquents.

In short, we view the proposal to withhold on dividends and interest as harmful to millions of Americans investors and savers, as a regressive step in the administration of the tax laws, and as one which will further complicate our already overly complex tax system. It represents a radical departure from efforts of the Congress and the Administration to reduce the burden of government on all Americans.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID SILVER.

MUTUAL FUNDS OPPOSE WITHHOLDING PROPOSALS

WASHINGTON, D.C., July 15.—The Investment Company Institute, the national association of mutual funds, sent a letter to all United States Senators today urging them to oppose the provisions of the Senate Finance Committee's tax bill for withholding 10 percent of the dividends and interest due to investors and savers. It calls the provisions "inequitable, costly and inefficient."

The withholding system would have cost mutual fund investors over $110 million in lost earnings on money deducted from their accounts in 1981, it says. The proposals would create particular hardship for people who depend on dividends and interest to meet current living expenses.

The provisions would impose "an enormous administrative burden on all financial institutions" the letter goes on. They could add as much as $36 million a year to the expenses of mutual funds alone, which would inevitably be borne by their 12 million shareholders.

To make tax evasion more difficult, the Institute supports measures to withhold interest and dividends from accounts which fail to supply the IRS with taxpayer ID numbers. But it calls the Finance Bill provisions "a blunderbuss approach to snare a relative handful of tax delinquents."

JULY 21, 1982.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of our members, the undersigned organizations wish to express adamant opposition to withholding at source of taxes on interest and dividends. After extensive discussions with the Treasury, industry representatives were unable to resolve the substantial technical problems involved in implementing the proposed exemptions. We remain convinced that the proposal would prove costly and virtually unworkable. Moreover, withholding would be a major disincentive to savings and investment. We therefore urge you to support the Kasten-Hollings amendment to strike withholding at source from the pending tax bill.

Sincerely,

American Bankers Association, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Credit Union National Association, Independent Bankers Association of America, Investment Company Institute, National Association of Federal Credit Unions, National Association of Mutual Savings Banks, United States League of Savings Associations.

WISCONSIN CREDIT UNION LEAGUE,
West Allis, Wis., July 15, 1982.

Subject: Withholding of Taxes on Interest and Dividends.

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTEN, JR.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

SENATOR KASTEN: Credit unions in Wisconsin strongly oppose withholding on interest and dividends. The Wisconsin Credit Union League represents 598 League member credit unions and voices their united objections.

The proposal, if passed, would put all credit unions in the tax raising business. It would be a most expensive procedure for credit unions (over 300 league-member credit unions have less than $500,000 in assets and operate with part-time and voluntary help).

We consider the proposal provided as unworkable, unfair and costly. Please help Wisconsin credit unions, representing one and a half million members, by voting down the withholding on interest and dividends.

Sincerely,

JOHN P. HILL,
President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey, Senator BRADY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has approximately 3½ minutes remaining.

Mr. DOLE. I yield another 1½ minutes to the Senator off the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I am sure, as all Senators have, I have been getting phone calls today and during the past week as we have discussed this tax bill. And the phone calls have been from the people, the banks and the thrift institutions, both large banks, small banks, big thrifts, and small thrifts. And although they know this is difficult work they have to do and it is new ground they are going to be plowing, just as it was new ground when we withheld from wages many years ago, they are willing to do it. They do not like it, they think it is going to be difficult, but they are willing to do it because they know we need the revenue for this tax bill in order not to have the deficit become any larger than it is.

So it seems to me that we have heard from the people that have to collect this money. They do not like it, but they are willing to do it.

Second, it seems to me this is simple sense to collect the taxes that are due rather than to impose some new ones. I do not know what we would do with this bill if we do not get this amount of revenue, whether it is exactly $12 billion or some higher figure. It seems to me we have to go back to the drawing board. Whether you call it a killer amendment or not is a matter of words.

Finally, I think we have all been talking for a long time about the fairness of the tax system. The editorials that I have read during the last week or 10 days indicate to me that the papers across the country very much feel that this is a fair tax bill. And one of the things we are trying to do is impress the American people that we are trying to be fair.

If the papers around the country and the TV people that have been commenting on it think it is fair, I think that is some indication that we are on the right track.

For these three reasons: First, that the people that collect the taxes think they can do it—it may cost some money, it is difficult, it is new, but they are willing to do it; second, the simple sense to collect taxes that are due rather than impose some new ones; and, third, that it is fair and this is the part of the bill that we ought to support.

So, for those reasons, I oppose the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and urge everyone to support the tax bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me congratulate the distinguished Senator from New Jersey. He is one Senator in the Chamber who is totally objective. He is going to be leaving here in a few months. He probably is the only one who understands this issue. He is out there in the real world. The rest of us are here. [Laughter.] So he understands the amendment and he knows what he is talking about.

I hope that everybody listened carefully. I certainly appreciate his willingness to speak out in favor of what I consider a step in the right direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the American Council of Life Insurance.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LIFE INSURANCE,
July 22, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am pleased to advise you that the Board of Directors of the American Council of Life Insurance—representing some 550 life insurance companies throughout the country—has today unanimously endorsed the provisions of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (H.R. 4961) designed to improve taxpayer compliance through the withholding on interest and dividends.

The nation's life insurance business strongly supports efforts by the Congress to reduce the Federal budget deficit, which your tax package will help to achieve. The withholding provisions adopted by the Finance Committee are an integral part of this legislation. The IRS has estimated that some 15 percent of dividend income and 11 percent of interest income is not reported by taxpayers. Clearly such a loophole must be closed.

It is vital that tax legislation be enacted this year that will raise the necessary funds to reduce the budget deficit. To strike the withholding provisions would seriously erode the important objectives sought in H.R. 4961. The ACLI Board of Directors, therefore, urges that such an amendment be defeated.

Best regards,
Sincerely,

ROBERT F. FROEHLKE.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain material that shows, for example, that nearly 90 percent of all elderly people are eligible for exemption under this Finance Committee amendment. We made every effort to make certain we did not impact on the elderly people and the low-income people. I would like to include all of that material in the RECORD because I think it is important and it should be part of the legislative history. We have answers to some of the questions raised in letters and I believe we have answers to some of the arguments raised in the letters and we believe they are valid.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that material be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following are points on the elderly exemption responses to industry concerns, and on the paperwork burdens of withholding.

ELDERLY EXEMPTION FROM WITHHOLDING

I. 1982 gross income of exempt taxpayer (assume no deductions): Single, $13,323; married: $22,214.

These levels will be higher in later years when the tax reduction in ERTA are fully effective. For example, in 1984 the $1500/$2,500 line will fall at: Single, $14,450; married, $24,214.

II. The effective rate of tax on each dollar of gross income of a non-exempt elderly person exceeds 11 percent. Thus, the 10-percent withholding will not result in any overwithholding.

III. Nearly 90 percent of all elderly people are eligible for the exemption:

There are 26 million Americans over 65.

11 million file tax returns.

8.3 million of those filing have dividend and interest income.

Only 2.7 million of those returns show tax above the $1,500 ($2,500) exemption limit

The 2.7 million non-exempt taxpayers earn $48 billion in interest and dividends.

CONCERNS RAISED BY BANKING INDUSTRY AGAINST INTEREST AND DIVIDEND WITHHOLDING

1. Concern. It would be preferable to have vigorous enforcement effort in conjunction with the information reporting systems.

Withholding, once in place, will be far less intrusive and costly than the use of thousands more enforcement agents, auditors, additional and higher fees and penalties. Such added coercive measures would not only further complicate administration of the law but would result in disrespect for the voluntary systems.

2. Concern. The costs of instituting a system of withholding is too burdensome, including the start-up costs and yearly maintenance expenses.

Start-up costs will be reimbursed by way of float.

Employers are required to bear the cost of maintaining the wage withholding system.

Much of the additional maintenance costs after start-up will result from compliance with information reporting requirements already in place.

Maintenance costs estimates show such expenses are not overly high, in addition such costs are deductible.

3. Concern. The system of exemption certificates:

(a) Costs too much because banks must solicit customers for their exemption certificates.

Solicitation by payors of exemption certificate is not required by the proposal.

The Internal Revenue Service will assume a significant role in the notification process.

(b) Will result in overwithholding on the elderly and infirm.

If the elderly had tax liability in the previous year of less than $1,500 ($2,500 on a joint return), they are entitled to file exemption certificates.

The Internal Revenue Service and Social Security Administration will help such persons in filing their exemption certificates during the start-up period.

(c) Is too burdensome on banks because they are being asked to enforce and police the system.

This is untrue because banks and all other payors will be entitled to rely on the exemption certificates they receive without a need to investigate if such certificates are in regular form.

4. Concern. The system of withholding proposed will reduce savings by Americans. Savings will be deterred by increased charges and reduced interest rates.

The reduction in yields on savings deposited with banks or other institutions will be so minimal as to not affect the investment decisions of reasonable investors. For example, if withholding occurs erroneously on a $10,000 deposit yielding 9 percent a year (paid quarterly), the depositor will lose $4.88 of interest income. The effective yield from the investment would therefore be reduced by five one-hundredths of one percent.

Further, the reduction in yield will be across-the-board so as one will have a competitive advantage.

Only tax evaders in fact lose because of withholding. No one argues that tax evasion is an appropriate savings incentive.

PAPERWORK ASPECTS OF WITHHOLDING

I. The withholding system works with existing tax reporting and payment requirements.

Payors must report dividend and interest payments aggregating $10 or more to the Internal Revenue Service. The proposed withholding system will use these same reports.

Payors must withhold income taxes from the employees and deposit those taxes with the Treasury on a regular basis. The same deposit system (modified to provide "float") will be used for withholding taxes on dividends and interest.

Taxes will be withheld only when the payor, under its data processing system, pays or credits amounts to recipients. Thus, only slight modifications need to be made to existing data processing systems.

II. Withholding certificates will not be a burden.

Banks, etc. will be compensated for their start-up costs which will include costs of accepting and processing initial applications.

The Internal Revenue Service or Social Security Administration will be able to notify elderly recipients of the exemption rights and the Internal Revenue Service can make information available on its toll-free number.

Certificates once filed would remain in effect until revoked.

Since certificates depend only on prior year tax liability and age, they would not change more than once a year. Most certificates for the elderly would remain in effect permanently.

Not all persons eligible for exemption will file certificates. In 1981, over 70 million of the 93 million individuals filing returns received refunds. These refunds averaged $679 despite the fact that the wage withholding system is designed to allow taxpayers to avoid overwithholding and despite efforts by the Internal Revenue Service to reduce voluntary overwithholding.

People who first become eligible for exemption because they reach age 65 will be use to withholding and may not choose to exempt themselves.

III. Recipients will benefit from withholding.

Taxes on complying taxpayers can be kept down by collecting tax due from individuals who don't report interest and dividend income.

Taxpayers will not have to declare and pay estimated tax as often since some tax will be paid through withholding.

Taxpayers will pay-as-they-go and therefore not be shocked by unexpected (and hard to manage) tax liabilities in April.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes off the bill to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the time agreement on the amendment, the time of the Senator from Kansas has expired. The Senator from Idaho is recognized under the time on the bill.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding.

Mr. President, I think our chairman has done a very excellent job of crafting a bill that complies with this budget resolution. I think many of us that are supporting the bill have strong philosophical problems with the proposition of increasing revenue to the Federal Treasury.

However, the reality of the situation is that we have to pass legislation to comply with the budget. We simply must put in place a budget so that those people who are making investments, those people who are managing financial portfolios for pension funds, those individuals who are investing in our capital markets will be assured that some semblance of order is being made by the Congress with regard to the budget process.

From a philosophical standpoint, I say to my good friend, the Senator from Kansas, that I remember well that when I was in college at the University of Idaho majoring in agriculture one of my professors Dr. George Woodbury, dean of the School of Horticulture, spoke of the evils of the withholding tax on earned income—in an agriculture course, no less. He said, "Some day this withholding tax will lead to prolific spending in Washington, where the politicians will spend everything and probably even more than they can raise." Well, that has happened.

I would like to do away with all withholding and let every American come in on the 15th of April as a responsible citizen and file his income taxes and pay the bill. But the fact of the matter is that since we do not have withholding on unearned income, 20 percent of the people earning interest and dividend income are not paying taxes on that income.

Now we are faced with the unpleasant task of raising revenue. Since we are already withholding taxes on earned income, and those individuals are being forced to comply with the law 99 percent of the time, why not equalize the law and withhold on interest and dividend income considering the fact we have to raise the revenue?

I appeal to my colleagues that are considering voting for this amendment. I have the greatest respect for my friends from Wisconsin and Georgia and others who are supporting this measure. However, if we want to get a package passed tonight we had better not vote for this amendment no matter how appealing it is.

That is why, Mr. President, I am going to stand with the Senator from Kansas who has worked so diligently to craft a bill that makes the best of a very bad situation. I hope after the elections that this Congress will come back and make some real reforms on long-term entitlement spending so we can, in fact, get control of our real problem.

I urge all my colleagues, no matter how difficult a vote this is, to vote down this amendment. If this amendment passes, we will be sending a very bad signal, in my judgment, to the financial markets and to all Americans that the Congress of the United States really is not going to come to grips with the long-term management and control of the Federal budget process.

So, I think all Members will be very well advised that it may seem to be a tough vote politically but, in the long run, you will be casting a vote that will help to implement the budget.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Idaho not only for his statement but for his work in the Senate Finance Committee, which has been exemplary. I appreciate his flawless support as we have gone through this very difficult exercise.

I yield 1 minute to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, with all respect to my colleague from New Jersey, if he would read our amendment, the first two sections mandate compliance through the filing of the 1099 form.

The reason we have 99 percent tax compliance on the wage earners is because people must file their W-2 forms. If we also required filing the 1099 form, it is reasonable to presume that we will have 99 percent compliance there, all without the filing of some 4 million additional returns and additional regulations, the $2-billion cost to set up the withholding system, and the $500 million to make the financial system as liquid as it was before withholding.

I thank my distinguished colleague from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to yield to the Senator from New Mexico and then to the distinguished majority leader.

I do not want to quarrel with my friends, the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from South Carolina, but their amendment takes about 90 percent of the savings in the first year and about 80 percent thereafter. It just takes out about $10 billion. That is all. Maybe we can pick up the $10 billion in some other way. Maybe the banks would like to pay a higher minimum tax. We will consider that, if we lose.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will not argue the technical parts of this amendment. I want to tell the Senate what I think we ought to do tonight. I do not think we ought to wait very long to do it. We ought to reduce the expected deficit of this country by passing this bill, and we ought to do that by the exact amount that this distinguished Finance Committee has asked us to.

Mr. President, today the Budget Committee, at the request of seven other standing committees, sent to the Senate another bill. It will reduce that deficit another $12 billion. If you add those, the $12 and the $118 billion in this bill, you have a real, not hypothetical, not made up, a real $130 billion reduction in the cumulative deficit of this country for the next 3 years.

Mr. President, there are people who do not want to be for this tax bill, raising $98 billion in 3 years, because they have their own game plan. They thought maybe we should raise $175 billion, a sum spoken of tonight. There are some who think we should have raised $200 billion in new taxes. But we are not hearing about that. We are hearing about the specific agenda. They would like to have their druthers.

I ask Senators, what would you tax? Is it not interesting? We would all have a different item to tax. Some said we should tax imported oil. We should put on a $10 per barrel tax, somebody said, and make a lot of money. It would help the domestic industry. Others said to get rid of the third year of the tax cut. We voted on that about six times, and there are not enough votes for that.

So what do we do? We sit here tonight when the Finance Committee has brought us a bill which basically is a collect-by-compliance bill, and a bill that has been heralded as fair and equitable. Many who are opposed to this amendment are not opposed to raising taxes. Some want to raise even more, but not this kind.

Mr. President, I am reminded of a story about economists. One of my people was telling me, "Why don't you tell the story about Mr. Brezhnev and the economists?"

He was watching a May Day parade. The missiles came by, the army came by, and then 12 men came by with gray hair and dark suits. He said to his friend, "Are they spies?" His friend said, "No, they are economists. Think of the havoc they are going to wreak on America when we turn them loose there."

Mr. President, I do not know what economists are telling us to do these days. Some have said we should force interest rates down with national usury laws, others are saying cut the taxes, others are saying cut the budget, others say spend more money.

I do not know what the consensus is. But I can tell you this, that commonsense tells this Senator that this is a rare opportunity for this institution to do what is absolutely, patently right, to reduce the deficit of this country by $118 billion. We are changing significant and substantive laws that we would not look at for 15 years. We will raise about $98 billion in taxes, while leaving in place 75 percent of last year's tax cut.

Mr. President, I urge that we not shirk that responsibility. We have this chance now. Next week we have the other reconciliation bill. We can at least say to the American people when we pass them both, "We did our share in an election year during a recession. We changed major, substantive entitlement laws of this land, setting precedents that Congress would not set in years past."

I do not think we should be stopped by this kind of argument: Have we or have we not exempted senior citizens; is it 90 percent of them who will not pay tax or is it 83 percent; how much is real compliance and how much is collecting in advance?

Nearly 90 percent of all elderly people are eligible for the exemption. Even that national group that wrote us and said, "Do not do this." It was marvelous to read their letter because they are just like everybody else here. They said, "Raise the $98 billion. We think we need the taxes to get this country going and to get the interest rates down. But do not do it this way."

We will not get there, Mr. President, if each of us has an agenda, our druthers, which tax to change and which not. In fact, I do not think this Senate could have had a Finance Committee in these kinds of times bring a fairer bill to the Senate floor. I just cannot believe we could have put together a team of staff and Senators with a chairman like Senator DOLE to bring a fairer bill to this body in these times.

And now tonight, to say because of this issue we are going to tell the American people they cannot have deficit reduction, they are not going to have this bill, leads me to believe that this amendment is the wrong thing to do. I hope we do not pass it.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, in the second session of the 96th Congress, I introduced Senate Resolution 411, expressing the sense of the Senate that no Federal withholding tax be imposed on dividends and interest received by any citizen or resident of the United States.

It is now the second session of the 97th Congress. The fiscal situation has changed; philosophies have changed. A Federal withholding tax on interest and dividends is now being seriously proposed. However changes have been introduced that make the present proposal more acceptable than that proposed by then-President Carter. The new legislation being proposed exempts individuals living on fixed-interest or dividend income and individuals having little or no income tax liability. I understand that the provision calling for withholding of a flat rate of 10 percent on payments of interest and dividends in H.R. 4961 would also exempt certain tax-exempt institutions, corporations, and the low-income elderly.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from California is correct.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Is it true that exemption certificates similar to IRS W-4 forms may be filed for exemptions by individuals who had no income tax liability in the preceding year or are 65 years or older and whose tax liability was $600, $1,000 on a joint return, or less in the preceding year?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct again. This provision has been included in the tax package to improve taxpayer compliance, not to be unfair to the elderly or low-income who are honest taxpayers. The Internal Revenue Service estimates that 15 percent of dividend income and 11 percent of interest income is not reported by taxpayers. Withholding would improve voluntary compliance and provide up to 20 percent of the total amount of revenue generated by the complete proposal.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I ask the Senator that when discussing this provision of H.R. 4961, he carefully consider the individuals who rely on meager investments to supplement their pensions. They will find it difficult, if not impossible, to survive if they have to wait for a refund of any Federal withholding tax on interest and dividends.

Mr. DOLE. I will certainly keep the Senator's concern in mind.

In fact, I instructed the officials of the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service to do the same, and we appreciate the Senator underscoring this important fact.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from California.

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Could the Senator from Kansas confirm the understanding of this Senator with respect to the application of the withholding provisions of the bill to Treasury bills? I understand that withholding will be required on Treasury bills under the same conditions that apply to similar debt obligations of private issuers.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. In particular, the Senator may wish to note the discussion of original issue discount on page 235 of the report of the Committee on Finance where Treasury bills are expressly described as subject to withholding.●

● Mr. BRADLEY. I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from Kansas to clarify my understanding of the definition of construction contract in the provision of H.R. 4961 entitled "Modification of Regulations on the Completed Contract Method of Accounting."

It is my understanding that the definition of construction contract in this provision includes contracts for the installation of large electrostatic precipitators and sulfur dioxide scrubbers which are installed in powerplants to trap pollutants.

Mr. DOLE. The understanding of the Senator from New Jersey is correct. These items are considered integral components to the powerplant. However, the definition of construction contract does not include a contract for the manufacture of pollution control equipment such as large electrostatic precipitators and sulfur dioxide scrubbers.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have read section 222 of the committee's bill and its report on that section and I would appreciate it if you would clarify the new approval requirements as they may apply to issuers of certain bonds within section 103(b) of the code.

Mr. DOLE. Certainly. Two such requirements are proposed. First a public hearing, with reasonable notice thereof, must be held prior to the approval of the bonds, and second, after that hearing an elected public official or legislative body must approve the issuance of the bonds.

Mr. BRADLEY. My questions about these requirements may be best addressed by focusing on a particular governmental entity, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, and its existing bond authorization procedures. Of course, for the purpose of my questions, I will assume that the bonds involved would be industrial development bonds within section 103(b).

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey is a bistate governmental instrumentality of the States of New York and New Jersey. It was created in 1921 by compact between the two States, with the consent of the U.S. Congress. In general, the port authority provides transportation, terminal, and other facilities of commerce within the Port of New York district which comprises an area of about 1,500 square miles in both States and includes the cities of New York and Yonkers in New York State, Newark and Jersey City in New Jersey, and over 200 other municipalities, including all or part of 17 counties, in the two States. The authority itself consists of 12 commissioners, six from each State, appointed by the Governor thereof with the advice and consent of the respective State senates. The actions they take at authority meetings, including the authorization of the issuance of the authority's obligations, are subject by bistate legislation to gubernatorial approval or veto.

Now, with respect to the port authority, typically there is more than one governmental unit which may have jurisdiction over the geographic areas in which the various authority facilities to be financed by such a borrowing are located—specifically, governmental units includes municipality in either the State of New York or the State of New Jersey, the port authority which owns, leases, and/or operates each of the facilities and the two States. It would appear that the required public hearing could be held by the port authority, with the appropriate approval to be given by the two Governors. Thus both the public hearing and public approval requirements would be met.

Mr. DOLE. That would satisfy the requirements of the bill, provided the hearing takes place in the jurisdiction where the facilities will be located.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I wish to lend my strong support to the amendment to strike the language in the tax bill which would impose Federal withholding taxes on interest and dividend income. This provision should never have been included in this bill, and I want to commend my colleague, Senator HOLLINGS, for his leadership in moving to strike this provision of the tax bill. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this amendment by Senator HOLLINGS and Senator KASTEN.

Mr. President, I have always believed that the imposition of a withholding tax on this type of income is both unworkable and counterproductive. Such proposals have been suggested in previous sessions of the Congress, and have been rightfully dropped without serious consideration.

The committee proposal on withholding of interest and dividends will work a significant hardship on our financial institutions. Savings and loan institutions will pay $435 million to put this withholding system in place. Credit unions would pay $378 million to put the withholding system in place.

Foremost in this debate, however, is the adverse impact that the withholding tax has on the individual depositor/investor. In hearings on Tuesday in the Senate Banking Committee, Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul Volcker reiterated the pressing need to promote savings and investment in order to rebuild our capital base. On that point, Mr. President, I know that we are all in agreement. Yet, the withholding provisions of the committee bill provide a serious savings disincentive.

This savings disincentive affects both large and small savers and investors. The largest investors, capable of and accustomed to using their larger interest and dividend income upon receipt, would be encouraged to move large accounts overseas. For smaller, community-oriented accounts, money would be taken out of local areas where funds would be run through local economies. At both ends of the scale, therefore, you have a withdrawal of capital from our economic base.

I would like to quote briefly from among the many communications that I have received on this issue. These comments reflect the widespread opposition to the withholding provision.

In a telegram from one of the largest banks in the Southeast:

> Urge you to delete from the tax bill as now approved by the Senate Finance Committee withholding 10 percent of interest and dividends . . . counterproductive to consumer savings and investments, costly to paying companies and IRS can police inclusion for taxable income from information already supplied to them.

In a letter from a small community bank in Tennessee:

> The additional operating costs associated withholding on interest and dividends and the potential loss of deposits could prove to be the final blow to many banks and Savings and Loans in Tennessee who are barely hanging on at this time.

And also very much to the point, in two letters from savers, some of whom have no tax liability even with withholding:

> I think this (the withholding proposal) is very unfair; it would work a hardship on the little fellow that has to count every penny he has to live on, the people on fixed incomes, the retired people, that try to save a few pennies for a rainy day.

And:

> My husband I have been filing and paying income taxes ever since he began to earn enough to have to pay income taxes years ago and we have filed and paid what was due our government regularly and on time. Moreover, years ago we began to file estimated tax returns and have paid our estimated tax each quarter when due. I am now widowed and my sole income we managed to save during his working years. Is it fair under these circumstances that I be penalized by the loss of interest that is held out before my taxes are due?

In sum, Mr. President, the withholding of interest and dividend income provisions should not be part of this tax bill. I urge adoption of the Hollings-Kasten amendment which I have cosponsored.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I oppose the provision in the committee bill requiring the withholding of dividend and interest payments by financial intermediaries. My opposition is based on a number of features of this proposed provision which will create an administrative nightmare and impose a substantial new burden and redtape on the private sector—and quite likely yield substantially less tax revenue than projected. Before reviewing those factors in detail, Mr. President, let me make this especially significant point:

This provision assumes that recipients of interest and dividends are tax cheats—that they willfully underreport interest and dividend income to dodge the Internal Revenue Service. That assumption simply does not square with fact. Indeed, taxpayer compliance in the areas of interest and dividend income is second only to compliance in the area of wages. Almost 90 percent of interest and 85 percent of dividend income is reported now—and a good portion of the remainder may well be received by individuals with little or no other taxable income to report—elderly widows and widowers, for example—and who owe no tax on that interest and dividend in any case.

SUSPECT REVENUE ESTIMATES

There are two factors at work which will tend to reduce, perhaps sharply reduce, the revenues estimated to be generated by the withholding provision. First, as I just noted, the prospect exists that current unreported dividend and interest payments are not taxable anyway. Second, the enormous cost of establishing and maintaining the elaborate police mechanism—involving every entity which disburses interest and dividends—is a tax deductible expense. It will be borne directly by disbursing agents and involve:

The development of completely new computer programs;

The purchase of additional computer capacity;

The consolidation of interest and dividend payment system;

The development of some scheme to identify those exempt interest and dividend recipients whose payments cannot be withheld; and

The development of some sort of jury rigging to deal with withholding of bearer-bond interest and other tax-exempt accounts.

All of that expense will be tax deductible, of course, and will notably erode any gain in tax receipts under this provision. In fact, the net revenue effect of this hastily drawn provision may be zero for all anyone knows. And that, Mr. President, is my point. There is an inadequate hearing record on this provision—like so many other components of this bill—and we know the results of this sort of hasty lawmaking: Inequitable and complicated tax laws which weaken the confidence of taxpayers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and jeopardize voluntary compliance—the heart of our tax system. The sad experience of France and many less developed nations regarding taxpayer avoidance should not be lost on the majority party here in the Senate. Individuals are far more clever at hiding income than bureaucrats and policemen are at finding it. Ill-considered and hastily drawn tax laws are not good laws regardless of the underlying merits of such laws.

LOW INCOME EXEMPTION

The withholding provision makes a nod toward the low income and elderly reporting problem by an exemption clause. This clause is scarcely workable and will be an administrative nightmare. In fact, I predict that Congress will be receiving letters and complaints regarding the bureaucratic procedures to carry out these exemptions until the day the entire withholding provision is scrapped. Let me hasten to add that I support the intent of the exemption clause, although I oppose the entire withholding provision. I am firmly convinced, however, that it is an overwhelming task to determine which passbook interest payment, which bond interest check, which money market fund dividend, which stock dividend, which reinvested stock dividend, which stock dividend paid in stock, and which taxable bearer-bond interest is being received by individuals exempt at a given time from this cumbersome withholding provision. Exemption is based on age and income, variables which obviously change at least from year to year—and sooner in many cases. And if, through some combination of luck and extravagant cost, a workable exemption mechanism is established, the chore on those elderly and lower income recipients of interest and dividends to update information will be onerous. It will add another piece of redtape flowing from Washington to snarl our elderly, waste their time, and expose them to criminal penalty for little reason. In addition, few Americans are willing for their income to be placed on Wall Street computer records. Yet, that will be the precise result of this exempt,on provision. It requires that disbursing agents hold a portion of everyone's interest and dividends—withholding which those exempt individuals can avoid only by revealing one of their most intimate personal facts—their income. Members of Congress must reveal their income for good reason. What good reason is there to impose that same requirement on every elderly or lower income person?

UNWILLING POLICEMEN

I do not want to suggest that the disbursing sector of our economy—the bankers, money market funds, thrifts, and brokerage houses—are eager to don the uniform of tax collectors. They are not. Indeed, they strongly resent having the Federal Government impose this added burden on them. They are certainly not equipped, as I noted earlier, to deal with the paperwork and expense of this new job—much less to pick and choose when to exempt and when not to exempt individuals from its provisions. It is an open question, as well, whether the IRS can manage the flood of new data and paper which will be generated by this provision. After all, over 100 million Americans receive interest or dividend payments—from savings accounts for 1-month old babies to fund college educations, to 90-year old widows with 25 shares of A.T. & T. The average corporate stockholder alone holds less than 100 shares.

The Finance Committee—and the Members of the Senate—should not be lulled into a belief that they are imposing a minor burden on eager disbursing agents involving only a few additional pieces of paper.

ADMINISTRATIVE NIGHTMARE

I have stressed the administrative nightmare the withholding provision will create. This issue is of greatest concern to the financial intermediaries who must act as policemen under this provision. I would like the flavor of this prospective chore to be clear to each Member here. The Western Stock Transfer Association in San Francisco has written every Senator, outlining the difficulty which such intermediaries will have in complying with this provision. I want to quote from that letter now:

> Banks would have severe problems in implementing the withholding of tax since many of their dividend and interest paying functions are independent of each other. Frequently, the records of these payments are kept on different computer systems within the bank. For example, shareholder records are maintained independently of bondholder records. The records for registered bondholders are separate from the records of bearer bonds. Interst paid on passbook savings is treated differently from the interest paid on a certificate of deposit, and so on. To integrate these multiple sources of payment into a single, unified withholding system would be a monumental and expensive task.
> In addition, the proposal would require that banks withhold tax from interest payments made when coupons detached from bearer bonds are presented for payment. Most bearer bonds today are tax exempt issues of States, municipalities, and their agencies, and would therefore not be subject to withholding. It does not seem reasonable to expect that tellers in thousands of branch bank offices throughout the [land] would be sophisticated enough to readily differentiate between taxable and tax exempt issues, and to withhold tax from only taxable bonds.
> Further, the proposal would require that the bank paying the bearer coupon prepare a form indicating that tax has been withheld and to file a copy of the form with the Internal Revenue Service. Many thousands of these forms would have to be prepared evey month, and this data would in turn have to be entered into the IRS computers.

CONCLUSION

To summarize, the withholding provision is unjustified in terms of taxpayer compliance. It will make every brokerage house, bank, credit union, and thrift institution an agent of the IRS. It may well generate very little new tax revenue. And, it will generate an enormous amount of new regulations and redtape. Indeed, this provision could well be called the "Red Tape Growth Act of 1982."●

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I will be brief but I do want to voice my very deep concern over the 10-percent interest and dividend withholding provision contained in the tax reconciliation bill. I am pleased that the Senator from Wisconsin has raised this issue.

Like others, I am deeply concerned over the size of the Federal deficit and I believe it is hindering our efforts to improve the Nation's economy. I am convinced that we have to shrink these deficits if we are to regain economic health. In order to do this I believe we have to make further spending cuts even though we have made great strides in this effort. But I also believe we cannot afford to completely overlook the revenue side of the ledger. Accordingly, I congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee for his efforts in this difficult task of pulling together a revenue raising package that meets the budget reconciliation requirements.

While there are some provisions in this package that I believe he is right on target with, I am greatly concerned over a number of others. I am particularly troubled that, once again, we are looking at the old standby revenue raiser, the imposition of withholding on interest and dividend income. This is certainly not a new idea and I am no more convinced now than I was several years ago that this is a wise or even necessary measure. At a time when the economy needs all the savings it can muster, we are considering this proposal that will act as a disincentive to saving. This can only have the effect of making money harder to get and more expensive. In fact, it has been estimated that withholding will reduce savers' and investors' reinvestment and compounding earnings by some $3 billion. In addition, this proposal is troubling because it will involve overwithholding in many instances. This is of special concern to many of Florida's elderly who depend on interest and dividends to meet everyday expenses. Even though this provision contains so-called elderly exemptions, many people will have to reclaim from the Federal Government as much as a year later, moneys, which in my opinion, should never have been withheld in the first place. Also, I believe it is an imposition to require elderly citizens to have to fill out exemption forms.

It also could not be a worse time to impose this burden on the financial institutions. At a time when many financial institutions are struggling, the last thing they need is another Federal paperwork nightmare. Even if withholding legislation is approved there will be followup regulations and interpretations necessary for implementation. Because of this, its highly unlikely that withholding could be placed into effect by the January 1, 1983, target date. Banks, S. & L.'s, credit unions and corporations that pay dividends would be faced with enormous costs and headaches in designing and putting into effect withholding systems. Exemption procedures and registration would have to be worked out and employee retraining would be necessary. It is my understanding that withholding will require the issuance of some 400 million exemption certificates. Systems would have to be able to withhold from some accounts but not others and would have to monitor switches in category. In short, I believe that withholding involves much more than just a slight modification of institutional procedures and reprograming of a computer.

I want to point out to my colleagues that American taxpayers are already reporting 85 percent of the interest and dividend they receive so, we are talking about going after only 15 percent in noncompliance. What we are thinking about doing here is creating a regulatory and paperwork dinosaur designed to do a job that could much more effectively be done using existing information and procedures. Financial institutions already file 1099 forms with the IRS that show earned interest income and the bill helps insure compliance by requiring that individual taxpayers submit their 1099 forms with their tax returns. This will help assure that there will be a matchup of interest and dividend information.

I hope my colleagues will carefully consider this ill-advised and ill-conceived withholding provision and I hope we will be successful in eliminating it from the tax bill.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I strongly support the provisions of the tax bill requiring the withholding of Federal income tax on payments of interest and dividends.

This provision is a matter of justice, fairness, and compliance with tax laws.

As every worker knows, the wages that he earns are subjected to withholding of Federal income taxes on every pay day, whether he is paid by the week, or the month.

Partly as a result of that highly successful withholding system, the Treasury Department estimates that 99 percent of all wages are reported on income tax returns, and taxes are paid on those wages.

But, no withholding of taxes is now required on income that is earned in the form of interest or dividends on invested money. Taxpayers are expected to report that dividend or interest income when they file their tax returns. But the fact is that many taxpayers do not report their interest or dividend income. The Treasury Department estimates that as much as 15 percent of dividend income, and as much as 11 percent of interest income is not reported by taxpayers—and taxes are just not paid on that income.

Mr. President, you can call this failure to report income noncompliance or tax evasion, but there is another single, simple clear word for it—cheating. There is one very effective way to stop the cheating and that is to withhold the taxes due on interest and dividends, just as we withhold the taxes due on wages and salaries of the average American.

And, in fact, under this provision, the withholding of taxes on interest and dividends proposed by the bill is more modest than the withholding of taxes on wages. The withholding of taxes on wages is designed to be as close as possible to the actual taxes due, while the withholding of taxes in interest and dividends is limited to just 10 percent, which in most cases will be less than the actual tax due. But the withholding will provide a strong incentive for each taxpayer to report all interest and dividend income to obtain the credit for the taxes withheld.

Fairness requires that income from interest and dividends be given the same treatment as the hard-earned wage income of workers.

There is a further strong budgetary reason for withholding of taxes on interest and dividends. The Treasury Department estimates that withholding will increase revenues by $12 billion over the next 3 years. That is tax revenue that would be owed, but not paid, unless we have withholding. At a time when we are faced with huge budget deficits that threaten to undermine the health of our economy, we cannot afford to overlook $12 billion in revenue that is now being lost to tax cheaters.

The major argument made against withholding of taxes on interest and dividends is the cost and complexity of paperwork required of financial institutions to accomplish the withholding. I am confident, however, that with the aid of computers this withholding should be no more complex than the withholding of taxes on wages and salaries.

Finally, it should be noted that the withholding provisions include exemptions from withholding for low-income persons, and for the elderly who owe less than $1,500 in taxes for a single person or $2,500 for an elderly couple.

For all of these reasons I believe withholding of taxes on interest and dividends is required and justified.●

DIVIDEND AND INTEREST WITHHOLDING PROVISIONS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the new withholding rules on interest and dividends include special rules which apply to original issue discount. Under new rules included in this bill, the stripped coupons and the stripped bond are treated as original issue discount obligations.

We recognize that the withholding rules may present some difficulties when a coupon bond is converted to OID instruments. Prior to a strip, the redemption of coupons would constitute interest, and withholding would occur when the coupons were redeemed. When the bond is stripped, basis is allocated to the coupons and OID income is recognized annually. Thus, in the year of redemption only a part of the amount paid is interest income on which there should be withholding. Difficulties arise because the party with the obligation to withhold may not know that the bond was stripped or may not know the holder's basis, date of purchase, or other information required to determine OID.

The Secretary, by regulations, may provide a mechanism by which the holder of stripped coupons or bonds may notify the payor that a coupon or bond is to be treated as an OID for withholding purposes. The notification would include sufficient information for the payor to determine the proper amount of withholding tax. Unless the payor receives such notification, the payor would be expected to withhold as if coupons had not been detached and the coupons and bonds were not OID instruments. The regulations should provide that if a payor receives such a notification, the payor may rely on the notification and the information contained therein in determining the amount to be withheld when a coupon or bond is redeemed.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Kansas would respond to an inquiry of mine. I am very much concerned, as are many others here, about financial institutions that will be impacted by the administrative burdens of this bill.

Section 309 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations which delay the application of some or all of the withholding provisions to small financial institutions until such time such institutions are able to comply with the requirements of the provisions.

There are many financial institutions in this country, and not just small ones, who are faced with problems, who are under great pressure already, and who may indeed be burdened administratively by requirements of withholding.

Assuming this amendment is defeated, my intention would be to offer an amendment which would apply that proscription to the Secretary of the Treasury to provide that he shall provide regulations which delay the application of withholding provisions to institutions no matter what size until such time such institutions are able to comply without undue burdens with the requirements of the provision.

My question to my friend from Kansas, who has done such an excellent job in managing this bill, is what his position would be on such an amendment in the event it is offered, assuming that the amendment of my friends from South Carolina and Wisconsin is defeated?

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield, I have discussed this matter with the Senator from Michigan and also with the staff of the Treasury Department. I am willing to accept the change and they are willing to accept the change providing the Secretary with the ability to defer the application under the provision referred to by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, I would like to yield to the distinguished majority leader to close the debate on our side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chairman. May I begin by congratulating Senator DOLE, of the Finance Committee, and Senator DOMENICI as chairman of the Budget Committee, and, indeed, all Members of the Senate, for continuing in their efforts to put this Nation's financial and fiscal affairs in order.

Mr. President, the next step in this arduous process is the Kasten amendment. This amendment must be examined in the context of how it relates to the task that the Congress of the United States, specifically the Senate, undertook when this body adopted a widely heralded budget resolution in an effort to reduce approximately a $180 billion deficit to something less than $110 billion, a big budget action.

It was not an easy fight; it was a difficult fight. But we passed it. It passed in the House of Representatives, it has survived the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and it has now been adopted by Congress.

Included in the resolution is a section known as reconciliation, which has somehow taken on a magical meaning. In truth, all it amounts to is the simple proposition; that we now go forward and perform on the promises we made to the American people? Was the budget resolution that we adopted a paper tiger, or does it have teeth? When we adopted the budget resolution, were we shoveling smoke or did we mean it? That is the question before us.

This deliberation is the first major test of whether we are serious about putting our house in order. As meritorious as the contentions are that were made by the Senator from Wisconsin and others on this subject, and undoubtedly because of the burden it will cast on some financial institutions and even individual citizens, we must nonetheless consider it in the context of whether we are really serious about putting the budget in order—about complying with that instruction.

Some will argue that we ought to do it some other way, that we ought to find some other source of revenue. Mr. President, you can always argue that. As long as there are a hundred of us in this Chamber, there will be essentially a hundred different views in how we should raise the revenue to operate the Government of the United States.

It is like a lawsuit. You can negotiate forever, but finally, when you try that case, it has an ending; it has a verdict and a judgment. That is the way it is in this debate. We can argue forever about what the relative merits of some other approach would be, but finally, in our system, it has to end.

We are at the end now. We finally have to decide, are we shoveling smoke, or are we serious? Was the budget amendment a paper tiger, or does it have teeth?

I am sympathetic to the provision providing for withholding on dividend and interest for several reasons. The argument of simple equity appeals to me most.

I had one Member of this body say, "Look, I am not even in favor of withholding on earned income, though we do it." If we are going to do it at all, we ought to do it. If we are going to withhold on my salary, and yours, withhold on your wages and mine, we ought to withhold on interest and dividends.

What is the rationale for excepting them and making them a special class, who have the use of that money while none of the rest of us do?

The proposal, as reported by the Committee on Finance, is an extraordinary measure, I think, for raising a significant amount of revenue without raising taxes. That is not sleight-of-hand. It is collecting the taxes that are due by removing the special advantage that those who receive dividends on interest have enjoyed through all of these years as measured against those who are wage earners, salary earners, and have that tax withheld from their salary or wages or earnings.

I think it is fair. I think it is equitable. I think it is highly desirable. I think, as much as I respect the Senator from Wisconsin, the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. President, if it is not defeated, this bill will have lost its meaning. We will have lost so much revenue that we no longer will have complied with the instruction that the Senate, itself, placed upon itself to find the money to reduce that deficit. If we lose this amendment, we have lost this bill for all practical purposes.

So, Mr. President, I urge that we carry through on the commitment we made to the country to reduce the deficit. I urge that we comply with the instruction we gave ourselves to find revenue and reduce expenditures. I urge that we recognize that, finally, this must come to an end, as it will tonight, I trust.

I urge that we convince the country, as we should, that we mean it when we adopt a budget, that we will meet the first challenge that comes our way to test whether we were serious or not.

Mr. President, this vote is perhaps the most important vote that we shall have on budgetary and fiscal matters during this session of Congress. Let us not fail.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, before I yield the floor, I understand the yeas and nays have been requested.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are three votes back to back, do I understand correctly, under the order previously entered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the first vote be a 15-minute rollcall vote and the next two be 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I share the goals of the majority leader and, as the majority leader and the Senator from New Mexico know, as a member of the Budget Committee, I supported the budget targets. But we are facing a critical choice.

This is indeed one of the most important votes we will face in this session, because we have before us a choice between balancing the budget with cuts in spending, and by creating real growth in our economy; or, for balancing the budget by increasing taxes. We also have a choice as to what kinds of taxes we raise. It is clear that savings and investment are key to economic growth, are major elements of jobs. Here we attacking savings and attacking investment with new taxes and with more regulation.

There are many alternatives that will not hamper growth or cost us more jobs. Today we should stand in favor of the people who are saving. We should stand hand in hand with the people who are investing. We should be on the side of the people who are working to provide the basis for growth—real growth—in this economy, the kind of growth that will provide new jobs and reduce the budget deficits in the years ahead.

There is no justification for new taxes on savings, for new taxes and regulations. Now is the time to stand in support of savings, in support of investors, and in support of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. MELCHER, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1127.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 185, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following:

BURIAL PLOTS AND EXPENSES

SEC. 186. (a) Section 1613(a) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (5);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (6) the following new paragraphs:

"(7) the value of any burial space (subject to such limits as to size or value as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe) held for the purpose of providing a burial place for the individual, his spouse, or any other member of his immediate family; and

"(8) any funds set aside for burial or cremation expenses, but only as provided in subsection (d).".

(b) Section 1613 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"Funds Set Aside for Burial or Cremation Expenses

"(d)(1) In determining the resources of an eligible individual and his spouse (if any) who is living with him in the same household, there shall be excluded an amount that is separately identifiable and has been set aside to meet the burial or cremation expenses, and related expenses, of such individual or spouse if the inclusion of any portion of such amount or amounts would cause the resources of such individual, or of such individual and spouse, to exceed the limits specified in paragraph (1) or (2) (whichever may be applicable) of section 1611 (a).

"(2) If the Secretary finds that any part of the amount excluded under paragraph (1) was used for purposes other than those for which it was set aside, he shall reduce any future benefits payable to the eligible individual (or to such individual and his spouse) by an amount equal to such part.".

(c) The amendment made by subsections (a) and (b) shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

On page 32, amend the table of contents by adding the following item after the term referring to section 185: "Sec. 185. Burial plots and expenses.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend momentarily while the Chair endeavors to obtain order in the Chamber. The Senate will come to order before the Senator will be permitted to continue.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I understand this amendment is acceptable to the managers of the pending bill. It is noncontroversial and corrects an omission of the social security law that constitutes an insensitive and appalling test of eligibility for supplemental security income.

Because the law is silent on this subject, burial spaces and funeral arrangements are being counted as assets for determining eligibility for SSI. For many elderly Americans, they are being faced with the macabre choice between lifesaving welfare assistance and giving up their plans for disposition of their bodily remains. The pending amendment would simply exclude funerary assets from being counted against eligibility for SSI.

Mr. DOLE. As a defender of the interests of older Americans, I can readily appreciate the dilemma described by the Honorable Senator from Nevada. In order to qualify for SSI benefits, an individual can only possess $1,500 in assets or $2,250 for a couple. Under existing law, certain essential resources are exempt from this assets calculation, including a home, a car, property used for self-support, and reasonable amounts of life insurance. Is the Senator from Nevada suggesting that burial arrangements be added to this list?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. All of these exclusions should be made in recognition of the fact that certain resources and contingencies are essential to everyday living—and, yes, even to preparing for death—and otherwise eligible applicants for vital assistance should not have to dispose of these items in order to qualify. SSI applicants are further confronted with the realization that their final resting place may not be with their spouse or family, but rather in some pauper's grave chosen by the State. Limitations are included in the amendment that would give the Secretary of Health and Human Services the discretion to set a fair and reasonable value limitation of funerary resources.

Mr. DOLE. I have no problems with accepting this amendment. Forcing many elderly citizens to, in effect, choose between welfare benefits over their funerary plans is an unfair and horribly insensitive choice. As a Senate leader dedicated to the interests of senior citizens, the Senator from Nevada is to be complimented for pursuing this matter of importance to thousands of older Americans nationwide. Further helping to expedite this situation, I understand that the House Ways and Means Committee has approved a similar provision in its reconciliation package.

Mr. President, I think this is an excellent amendment. It has been cleared very carefully by staff on both sides. I commend the distinguished Senator from Nevada for offering it. We thought we might take care of it by a colloquy, but we were advised it would be better to proceed with the amendment.

I thank the Senator from Nevada for fulfilling a very important obligation to a lot of people.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON.)

The amendment (UP No. 1127) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

(The following proceedings occurred later:)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, earlier this evening an amendment was offered by the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) which the Senate approved. The amendment would allow a needy individual to exclude an amount he set aside for burial expenses in determining eligibility for supplementary security income. Having examined the text of the amendment, we feel that the Secretary of Health and Human Services should be allowed to prescribe reasonable limits on how much an individual may set aside.

I submit a modification to the Cannon amendment that would give the Secretary this authority. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to modify the amendment and that the amendment be so modified. I have discussed this with the distinguished Senator from Nevada, and he has no objection. This was raised by one of the staff members of the committee.

I send the modification to the desk.

The modification is as follows:

Modification of Cannon Unprinted Amendment No. 1127 on page 2, line 4, after "amount", insert "(subject to such limits as prescribed by the Secretary)".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is so modified.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, with respect to the amendment just offered by both Senators from Maine, it is suggested that we add at the end of the amendment the words "in a new plan." I ask unanimous consent that that amendment, which has been adopted, be so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Conclusion of later proceedings.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will suspend briefly, the Chair reminds all Senators and others in the Chamber that the Senator from Kansas has been recognized and wishes to address the Chamber and cannot be heard unless the Senate is in order

Mr. DOLE. Mr President, I will yield to the Senator from Michigan in just about a minute, but I understand both Senators from Utah and the Senator from Hawaii have an amendment that perhaps we can take up. I think the Senator from Michigan has a technical amendment which we discussed a few moments ago and one which we think is a good amendment and which should be accepted.

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan may be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1128

(Purpose: To exempt certain financial institutions from the withholding requirement until they are able to comply without undue burden)

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) for himself and Ms. BRADLEY proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1128.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 500, line 16, strike the following: "which are small financial institutions".

On page 500, line 17, after the word "comply" add the following: "without undue burden".

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, we have just adopted an amendment which provides for withholding savings account interest. Section 309 directs the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt regulations which delay the application of the withholding provision for small financial institutions until such time as such institutions are able to comply with the requirements of such provision.

Mr. President, financial institutions of all sizes, not just small ones, are under great pressure in this country. It is not just these small financial institutions which might be burdened by these additional withholding requirements which will be imposed.

This amendment would apply the direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to delay the withholding requirement to all financial institutions, not just small financial institutions, and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to delay the new withholding requirements for all financial institutions until such time as such institutions are able to comply without undue burden with the requirements of the new withholding provision.

That is the simple, straightforward gist of this amendment. It says that we should do for all financial institutions that might be burdened by these new requirements as we have previously done in the bill for small financial institutions.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order from the Senator from California is well taken. The Chamber is noisy. The Chair requests all Senators to retire from the Chamber if it is their desire to converse.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator from California and I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, the straightforward purpose of this amendment is to provide that the Treasury withhold the new withholding requirement from all financial institutions, not just small ones, until these institutions are able to comply "without undue burden," the added words of this amendment, with the requirements of the new withholding requirement.

I understand the manager of the bill is supportive and agreeable to this amendment. Under those circumstances, I yield back the remainder of my time on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this is the same amendment I discussed with the distinguished Senator from Michigan about 30 or 40 minutes ago. It is a good amendment. It has been cleared with Treasury. It has been cleared on both sides. I am very pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I would like to compliment the Senator from Michigan on the amendment. I think it is a very good amendment. I think it preserves the possibility that no institution will even come close to failing because of a burdensome requirement.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend from New Jersey. This will apply to financial institutions of all size where difficulty could exist in complying with it.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Will the Senator from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. When he speaks of a delay in getting the system of withholding going for a period of time, how long a period of time is he thinking of?

Mr. LEVIN. The bill does not specify a time, I say to my friend from California. The bill presently reads that the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations which delay the new rules, in section 309. It does not say for how long but it limits it to small financial institutions. My amendment does not change the delay part of the provision. It continues to use that word "delay." It does not specify a time period any more than the original bill language specifies a time period. But it applies the same rule to all financial institutions as the bill did to small financial institutions and adds the language "until such time as such institutions are able to comply without undue burden." Those are the new words, "without undue burden." But there is no change in the language that specified "delay."

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Does the distinguished Senator believe that this amendment would cover a period of perhaps a year?

Mr. LEVIN. I would not put a time period on it. I think it should be delayed until financial institutions, whatever their size, can comply with the regulations without undue burden. Whatever time is necessary is the intent of this amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. Will the Senator from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield.

Mr. KASTEN. I did not understand the beginning part of the amendment, but is it the intention of the Senator that the withholding requirement would be delayed for all financial institutions until all financial institutions are deemed able to comply, or is it his intention that we dribble them in as one group after another indicates they were willing to comply?

Mr. LEVIN. The language would provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall delay applying these regulations to institutions until they are able to comply without undue burden. That will allow flexibility. I do not think they ought to be dribbled in institution by institution. Obviously, there ought to be some cohesiveness in the approach, but it does allow flexibility to the Secretary of the Treasury. More important, the purpose is not to give flexibility to the Secretary, but the purpose is to give financial institutions, whatever size, large or small, the opportunity to make the case to the Secretary of the Treasury that the regulations should be delayed until they can be complied with without undue burden. That is the leverage that it gives to the financial institutions regardless of their size.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. KASTEN. If the Senator from Michigan will yield for a further question, and I would also like the chairman to reply to the same question, it is my understanding and it is my hope that the intent of this language is that we wait until it is deemed possible that all financial institutions, regardless of size, are able to comply, and at that time all financial institutions will come in under this new provision. In other words, we would not want a large, computerized bank in a city to come in on day one and wait for 2 years to require a small country bank that did not have computers to come in, and during that time we would have in the same area one bank that was withholding and another that was not. It would be my hope that it is the intent of the Senator from Michigan, with the agreement of the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, that at a certain time all institutions would comply and all would fall in, but until we establish the fact that all institutions can comply, then no institution would fall in. Is that the intention?

Mr. LEVIN. That is not the intent. The intent is that any institution covered by the regulation, large or small, would not comply if there was undue burden, until such time as they can be covered without undue burden. The Secretary of the Treasury would not have to wait to apply the rules because there is another class of institution which would be covered without undue burden.

Mr. KASTEN. I hope the Secretary of the Treasury will also take into consideration the problem that could occur when one institution in a marketing area which would be forced to comply on day one and another institution in the same marketing area for some reason or another was unable to comply. We do not want to force them to go through huge expenses of software and hardware in order to make them comply, but at the same time we want to be aware of the marketing difficulties this will create if you withhold in one place and not in another.

Mr. LEVIN. I understand what the Senator is saying, and I think there is a real problem, which he has identified in the debate. I might point out to the Senator that the present language of the bill makes a distinction between small institutions and other institutions, and it takes the same problem in terms of possible competitive edge. We would not want this amendment to compound that problem.

Mr. KASTEN. I would like the amendment to suggest that neither the big one or the small one would be pushed to comply until both can comply.

Mr. LEVIN. I understand the desire of the Senator. But that is not quite the intent. It gives greater flexibility to the Secretary of the Treasury, but its major intent is not to give the flexibility to the Secretary of the Treasury but it is to give the opening to institutions, whatever their size, to persuade the Secretary of the Treasury that new regulations should not be put into effect because they are unduly burdensome. That is the principal intent of this amendment.

I understand what the Senator is saying. I do not go quite as far as the Senator would like in that regard, but I think it is intended to go a long way to meet the concerns which have been very properly identified by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I support the efforts of the Senator from Michigan. I hope the Secretary of the Treasury, with the discretion in the language of the bill, would also recognize the marketing problems that could come up, and take into consideration these marketing problems which could come up. There is no point in forcing expenses onto the small institutions but neither do we want to create a noncompetitive situation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me say to both Senators, particularly the Senator from Michigan, the author, that, as I said earlier, this gives greater flexibility, which is what he is trying to provide. I think the Senator from Wisconsin identifies a problem that could occur. There are probably a number of those. They should not be forced to do something when there is some undue burden. That is what the Senator from Michigan provides. In my view it is a good amendment and should be accepted. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back? Does the Senator from Michigan yield back his time?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield back my remaining time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1128) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1129

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senator DODD and ask for its immediate consideration.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), for himself and Mr. DODD, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1129.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 376, insert the following new subsections immediately after line 22:

"(c) PROHIBITION AGAINST DEDUCTION OF INTEREST IN EXCESS OF AMOUNT CREDITED TO GROUP PENSION POLICYHOLDERS.—Section 805(a) (relating to the determination of policy and other contract liability requirements) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) Special limitation for group pension contracts. For periods beginning after July 2, 1983, the amount determined under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) for policy and other contract liability requirements for group pension contracts shall not exceed the amount of interest actually credited to the policyholder whether such crediting is through premium rate computations, reserve increases, excess interest, experience rate credits, policyholder dividends or otherwise. The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this subsection.

"(d) PROHIBITION AGAINST CHANGING THE QUALIFICATION STATUS OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.—For any taxable year ending before January 1, 1985, a taxpayer shall not be treated as other than a life insurance company (as defined in section 801(a) of such Code) because of the effect of amounts held under contracts described in section 805(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, but which do not contain permanent annuity purchase rate guarantees."

On page 384, insert the following new paragraph immediately after line 16:

"(3) Special Rule for Participating Contracts.—In the case of an annuity contract which is not a qualified contract because it fails to satisfy the requirements of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (2), such contract shall be treated as meeting such requirement if, at the election of the taxpayer issuing such contract, the amount taken into account as qualified guaranteed interest for purposes of this section is limited to 92½ percent of the total amount paid or credited with respect to such contract and such total amount (or portion thereof) shall not be taken into account as a deduction under any other provision under this part. Similar rules shall apply with respect to such amounts for purposes of subpart C of this part. The election under this subsection shall be made at such time and in such manner as may be required under regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

On page 392, on line 22, strike out "120" and insert in lieu thereof "60".

DEFINITION OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this amendment preserves the status quo concerning qualification as a life insurance company by placing a moratorium in Internal Revenue Service actions in this area for the duration of the "stopgap" period. There is no revenue effect because this proposal is actually the assumption everyone has made in arriving at the revenue estimates under this legislation.

The IRS has recently notified companies that they are reviewing the technical factors which determine whether companies which are commonly recognized as major life insurance companies will be taxed as life insurance companies or instead will be reclassified as property/casualty insurance companies. A ruling which would overturn the longstanding classification of companies as life insurance companies would alter the carefully crafted "stopgap" tax agreement underlying the legislation proceeding through Congress.

A ruling permitting large life insurers to be taxed as property/casualty companies would provide significant tax benefits to mutual companies while at the same time significantly and adversely affecting their competitors which are large stock companies by, in effect, destroying carefully considered statutory provisions that have been in the law for years.

Therefore, Congress should adopt a rule in the legislation now pending which would have the effect of continuing to consider companies which everyone recognizes as life insurance companies the same way they have been for years, as life insurance companies. This proposal assures tax compliance by all members of the industry and preserves competitive balance.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this matter was called to my attention by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD). We have been working, both yesterday and today, with Treasury and the insurance industry, and it is my understanding that there has been resolution of all the differences and all the problems. I shall try to explain it very briefly. If I need assistance, I am certain the Senator from Connecticut will be helpful.

QUALIFICATION OF COMPANIES AS LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

The Senator from Kansas has been concerned that some life insurance companies might inadvertently be disqualified from life insurance status for tax purposes if the IRS were to issue adverse letter rulings in this rather complicated area.

This Senator has some reluctance to grandfather aggressive tax planning techniques which, although having some basis in the law, are not free from doubt as to outcome. However, there are many areas of the tax law concerning life insurance companies that should be reviewed. That is the rationale behind including life insurance provisions in this bill which will sunset after 3 years. This temporary rule for rulings relating to qualification of life insurance companies is consistent with the concept of providing a relatively short period of time for a full-scale review of the system of life insurance taxation. In that spirit, this Senator would say that the first portion of this amendment is reasonable.

THE 100-PERCENT DEDUCTION FOR PENSION BUSINESS

This amendment, more importantly, clears up a problem left unresolved by the bill as reported.

Mr. President, in the Finance Committee we were moving rather quickly and the staff worked all weekend and all the following week trying to put the documents together, but there are always some problems that have not been resolved. The bill is intended to allow a 100-percent deduction for amounts credited on pension business, no more and no less. However, under the language now in the bill, there is a possibility that companies would take more than a 100-percent deduction. This amendment would make certain that this could not happen in the future.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Connecticut for helping us correct what could have been an area of abuse.

DEDUCTION OF CERTAIN AMOUNTS CREDITED TO ANNUITY BUSINESS

The committee bill allows companies to deduct 100 percent of amounts credited on deferred annuity business if it is sold on a nonparticipating basis, that is, if dividends are not paid, based on experience. The effect of this provision is that mutual life insurance companies would be able to deduct only 77½ percent of amounts credited because they do not issue unparticipating annuity contracts and participating contracts are limited to a 77½-percent deduction for the company.

The amendment essentially would allow mutual companies to deduct 92½ percent of amounts credited on an annuity business. This 7½-percent differential reflects the ownership interest in the company of a mutual company's contract holders. It is consistent with the committee bill which provides a 77½ percent safety net for mutual companies and an 85-percent safety net for stock companies for deductibility of policyholder dividends.

This Senator believes that the amendment provides a reasonable result consistent with the Finance Committee's action.

WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN AMOUNTS IN ANNUITY FORM

Finally, the amendment would provide that no penalty would be imposed upon an individual who takes the money from his deferred annuity in essentially equal installments over a 60-month period. The Finance Committee bill provided that amounts would have to be withdrawn over a 120-month period in order to avoid the 10-percent penalty.

This Senator is satisfied that the potential for abuse of deferred annuities as short-term investment vehicles will be substantially limited if individuals must receive their accumulations over a 5-year period.

Mr. President, I think that fully explains the amendment unless the distinguished Senator from Connecticut has something to say.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I think the Senator did an excellent job of explaining the measure. It is a highly complicated matter. This is an interim provision. For 3 years we will have a stopgap period in which we are trying to work out a comprehensive tax approach to life insurance and to insurance generally. I am pleased that the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Kansas, has offered this amendment. I am delighted to cosponsor it with him. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will yield, what revenue impact, if any, would this amendment have?

Mr. DOLE. Zero.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. LONG. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1129) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1130

(Purpose: To eliminate withholding on certain qualified written notices of allocation if less than 50 percent of such notice is paid in money or qualified check)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS) be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS), for himself, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. EXON, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. GORTON, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. EAGLETON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1130.

On page 481, line 13, strike out "(as defined in section 1388(c))".

On page 481, line 15, strike out "as defined in section 1388(d)".

On page 482, line 14, strike out "and".

On page 482, strike out lines 15 through 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(ii) a qualified written notice of allocation described in section 1388(c)(1)(A) shall be taken into account at its stated dollar amount, and

"(iii) a qualified written notice of allocation described in section 1388(c)(1)(B) (and not in section 1388(c)(1)(A)) shall be taken into account only if 50 percent or more of such qualified written notice of allocation is paid in money or by qualified check.

"(D) Definitions.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) Qualified written notice of allocation.—The term 'qualified written notice of allocation' has the meaning given to such term by section 1388(c).

"(ii) Nonqualified written notice of allocation.—The term 'nonqualified written notice of allocation' has the meaning given to such term by section 1388(d).

"(iii) Qualified check.—The term 'qualified check' has the meaning given to such term by section 1388(c)(4).

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be added as cosponsors: Senators BAUCUS, GRASSLEY, DURENBERGER, BOSCHWITZ, KASSEBAUM, ZORINSKY, DOLE, PRESSLER, EXON, ABDNOR, HEINZ, DOMENICI, DANFORTH, HUDDLESTON, COCHRAN, MELCHER, GORTON, WALLOP, JEPSEN, SYMMS, SASSER, EAGLETON, and BURDICK.

This is a technical amendment that allows doing away with withholding on cooperatives' patronage dividends where less than 50 percent are paid in cash. It takes care of the small neighborhood cooperatives and takes care of a technical error in the bill. I hope it will be adopted. I yield to my colleague from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) a cosponsor of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senators named by the Senator from North Dakota will be added as cosponsors.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, as the Senator from North Dakota has so aptly described the amendment, it takes care of a technical oversight which occurred when the committee adopted the withholding on interest and dividend provisions.

Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this amendment which concerns withholding on patronage dividends. This amendment corrects what I feel is an oversight in the drafting of this legislation.

Patronage dividends are used by agricultural cooperatives—they represent price adjustments allocated to coop members after the cooperative determines its cost of doing business.

There are several good reasons why patronage dividends should not be included in the bill.

First, patronage dividends should not be subject to the withholding provisions because, to my knowledge, there have been no hearings in the Senate or the House to determine the effects of this move on the operation of the co-ops. This has not been proposed since 1962—when it was soundly defeated.

Second, the entire amount of the patronage dividend must be declared by a co-op patron as income in the year received. The only effect of subjecting patronage dividends to withholding is having tax revenue flow to the Treasury earlier in the year.

I believe this benefit is overshadowed by the tremendous paperwork burden created for cooperatives and the cash flow burden on farmers: Farmers simply cannot afford another loss of operating cash—they are already hard pressed to generate cash flow with today's rising cost of production and low farm prices.

Mr. President, I have not seen a specific tally by Treasury of the revenues generated by subjecting patronage dividends to withholding. I believe—at the very least—we need this calculation before passing this measure—which has a devastating impact on the operation of farm co-ops.

Remember, the entire amount of ordinary dividends or interest income is available to the recipient. On the other hand, only 20 percent of a patronage dividend is subject to tax as income.

The practical effect of imposing a 10-percent withholding on patronage dividends—as the bill does now—would be to reduce the cash portion a farmer receives of the patronage dividends by 50 percent. This occurs because 10 percent of the total patronage dividend is subject to withholding; 10 percent of the total is withheld from the cash portion—and only 20 percent of the total is paid in cash.

Mr. President, a vote against this amendment is a vote against cooperatives. A vote against this amendment is a vote against farmers, and ultimately a vote against the consumer.

I believe the damage done by this section of the bill far outweighs the benefits to the Treasury. It needs to be changed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a position paper of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives be printed in the RECORD following my statement. I also ask that a statement by the National Farmers Union be printed in the RECORD.

I urge adoption of the amendment.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMER COOPERATIVES,
Washington, D.C. July 21, 1982.

PATRONAGE DIVIDENDS SHOULD NOT BE SUBJECTED TO THE WITHHOLDING PROVISIONS OF H.R. 4961

"Patronage dividends" are not dividends in the ordinary sense of the word. Instead they represent price adjustments allocated to members after the cooperative has determined its cost of doing business for the year involved.

In order for the cooperative to qualify under the Internal Revenue Code for a deduction on patronage dividends paid to patrons, at least 20 percent of the payment must be in cash and the patron must consent to treat the entire amount of the patronage dividend as income in the year received. The patron thus incurs tax liability on the entire amount. The following simple example will illustrate.

Assume a farmer cooperative has net margins of $500,000. It determines that patron X is entitled to 1/500th of the margin based on the value or amount of business done with the cooperative. Therefore, patron X is entitled to receive a $1,000.00 patronage dividend, $200.00 of which is required to be paid in cash. The other $800.00 is allocated to patron X on the cooperative's books as an equity interest to be revolved out on a timetable approved by the Board of Directors. Nevertheless, patron X pays a current tax on the total amount of the patronage dividend, both the cash and the noncash portion.

The example demonstrates the difference between ordinary dividends or interest (where the entire amount is immediately available to the recipient) and a patronage dividend (where the recipient not only receives a lesser amount in cash but also pays tax on amounts not received but merely allocated on the books). The practical effect of imposing a 10 percent withholding on patronage dividends in the example shown above is that the farmer patron will have the cash portion of his patronage dividend reduced by 50 percent since $100.00 (10 percent of the entire patronage dividend) will be withheld from the $200.00 cash payment. Such a requirement places a tremendous cash flow burden on farmers at a time when they can ill afford it.

The Internal Revenue Service estimates that 15 percent of dividend income and 11 percent of interest income is not reported by taxpayers. In contrast, all patronage dividends paid by former cooperatives are reported on Form 1099-PATR. Thus, withholding is not needed to assure that patronage dividends are fully reported for income tax purposes.

Finally, the bookkeeping requirements and cost associated with a withholding system will utimately be borne by the farmer-patrons, since cooperatives operate at cost for the mutual benefit of their members.

For all the foregoing reasons, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives submits that patronage dividends should not be subjected to the withholding provisions of H.R. 4961.

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION,
July 20, 1982.

URGENT LEGISLATIVE MESSAGE

To: Members of the U.S. Senate.
From: Carl W. Ek, Legislative Assistant.
Subject: Treatment of Patronage Refunds in H.R. 4961.

The National Farmers Union respectfully requests that you support any amendments to delete provisions in H.R. 4961 which are injurious to farmer cooperatives.

Section 301 and 304 of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 both contain language which, if adopted, might seriously impair the American cooperative system. Patronage refunds, the essence of this self-help enterprise, constitute the equity a farmer holds in his cooperative and should not be treated in the same manner as interest or dividend income. Moreover, the directive requiring cooperatives to report all patronage payments exceeding $10 would place a costly and inequitable burden on accounting procedures. Finally, this proposal would have no significant impact upon the federal budget; it would only serve to further erode the diminished financial condition of American farmers.

Mr BAUCUS. I thank the Senator from North Dakota for his leadership in this matter.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana. These are small local cooperatives which, in many cases, simply do not even have the facilities to handle the withholding.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me state beforehand that, again, this amendment has been under consideration for the last several days. The Senator from Montana and the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Kansas reviewed the amendment. I have discussed it with Treasury officials. I think it has been cleared on both sides. We are prepared to accept the amendment. I know the Senator from Ohio has a question.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The only question I have is, what is the revenue impact, if any?

Mr. ANDREWS. To the best of my knowledge, there is none.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we were advised by the Treasury that it is negligible.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

Mr. LONG. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP 1130) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH, has an amendment, along with Senator MATSUNAGA and Senator GARN.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If the manager of the bill is prepared for an amendment, I am prepared to offer one if nobody else is ready to go.

Mr. DOLE. Fine.

UP AMENDMENT 1131

(Purpose: To provide that proposed increases in the unemployment tax shall not become effective until such time as a program has been enacted providing for 13 additional weeks of unemployment compensation for workers who have exhausted their eligibility for regular and extended benefits)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) for himself, Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. RIEGLE proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1131.

On page 429, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

(c) The amendment made by subsections (a) and (b) shall not become effective with respect to any calendar year to which they would otherwise apply unless, prior to January 1, 1983, there has been enacted into law a program, which shall become effective in calendar year 1982, under which Federal payments are to be made to provide, or to reimburse States for the cost of, not less than 13 additional weeks of eligibility for unemployment compensation, for workers who have exhausted their rights to any regular unemployment compensation, and, in the case of a State in which an extended benefit period is in effect, have exhausted their rights to any extended unemployment compensation.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the amendment I am offering today provides that the increases in unemployment tax shall not become effective until Congress enacts a program to provide 13 additional weeks of unemployment compensation for workers who have exhausted their eligibility for regular and extended benefits.

Today, approximately 2 million people have exhausted their regular and extended unemployment benefits. These are workers who have paid into the system, the same hard-working people the President of the United States described during his Presidential campaign as "American's unsung heroes and heroines."

Last month in Ohio I heard the stories of some of those who have exhausted their benefits. People with 17 and 18 years of seniority are on the street without hope of being called back to work. Men and women are watching their cars and homes being repossessed and parents are being forced to abandon their dream of higher education for their children.

People who never before thought that they would be forced to turn to welfare, are finding after they apply that they are not qualified.

These are people who have played by the rules. They have paid their taxes and worked hard all their lives without asking for assistance. And now, when they need the help of the Federal Government, it is not forthcoming.

In fact, the response of Congress and the administration to the urgent needs of the unemployed has been the reverse of what is needed.

With 10 million Americans out of work, this Congress and this administration have virtually eliminated trade readjustment assistance and CETA. And the Congress and the administration have changed the formula that triggers extended benefits by not counting the men and women already in the extended benefits program, thereby making it harder for States to qualify for extra assistance. As a result, Indiana with an unemployment rate of 11.4 percent, along with Massachusetts, Delaware, Minnesota, Arkansas, Maine, New Jersey, and Missouri are not on the extended benefits program. This change has affected over 80,000 people in these States alone.

And finally, this Congress and this administration have tightened the eligibility for welfare and food stamps which had made it even harder for those who have exhausted their benefits to receive assistance of any sort.

My amendment would provide assistance to people who urgently need it. Quite simply, it says if we are going to increase unemployment taxes, let us also enact an additional 13 weeks of unemployment benefits for workers who have exhausted their eligibility for regular and extended benefits.

The amendment does not mandate the type of program which must be enacted. It leaves to the appropriate committee the prerogative of working out the details of the legislation. But the amendment does say that if we are going to have the tax, we should also be assisting those who, through no fault of their own, are in need.

I believe this is a fair exchange. It is the least we can do to help alleviate the pain and suffering that millions of Americans are experiencing. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment to show to those who are unemployed that we understand their plight and will respond with compassion.

Mr. President, this amendment is a very simple and elementary one. We are increasing the unemployment taxes under this legislation by an amount approximating, I believe, $6 billion over a period of 3 years. There is nothing moving in the Senate to take care of the unemployed workers of this country, and all this amendment says is that although we are increasing the taxes, that increased tax provision will not be operable until such time as Congress enacts legislation extending the period of unemployment benefits for an additional 13 weeks.

The House is already moving in this direction. I think it is reasonable to assume that the House will enact the legislation. I think it is fair to explain to the Members of the Senate that although there will be some budgetary impact, it is not of major proportion, and on the House side allowances have already been made for the budgetary implications.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been asked for. Is there a sufficient second? There is sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JEPSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is informed that there is a rollcall in progress. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded?

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, that is what I was about to do. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue to call the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Keith Barton be allowed the privileges of the floor for the remainder of the evening.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in the same manner as has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. All time has expired.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, has time expired on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time on the amendment has expired. Does the Senator yield himself time on the bill?

Mr. DOLE. Just about 2 minutes.

Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will just take a minute or two. The hour is late and there are several more amendments.

Let me advise my colleagues that the Senate Finance Committee has scheduled a hearing on the question of additional weeks of unemployment compensation benefits for Thursday, July 29, at 9:30 a.m.

I might say this is the direct result of the request of the distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, who asked me if we could do that, and we did it very promptly. In fact, we scheduled it the day after the request was made, and agreed that we could do it, so I hope we can have hearings on this very important provision.

I think before we act, before we lock the Congress into the enactment of this very expensive program, we should allow the Committee on Finance to have the opportunity to study the issue.

The Senate is currently debating a reconciliation bill, a bill designed to reduce the Federal deficit and bring Federal spending down, and here is an amendment to take Federal spending up. Again it would seem to me, although I am sympathetic with what the distinguished Senator from Ohio wishes to do, I hope we can defer a decision until after we have had some hearings. I have some other fine remarks in this statement.

Before we act on this subject, before we lock the Congress into enactment of this very expensive program, it seems to me we should allow the Finance Committee the opportunity to study the issue and evaluate whether or not a full year of unemployment benefits is necessary or justified.

The Senate is currently debating a reconciliation bill—a bill designed to reduce the Federal deficit and bring Federal spending—at least that portion of the Federal budget under the jurisdiction of our committee—under control. The addition of an expensive spending amendment will only mean we must look elsewhere for either more savings or more revenues.

On the more basic subject of the Senator's amendment, I would remind my colleagues that unemployment compensation is designed to provide income support during relatively short spells of unemployment. However, there are times when the duration of unemployment benefits should be increased. This is why we enacted the extended benefits (EB) program.

The EB program "triggers on" during periods of high unemployment on a State-by-State basis. Three extra months, 13 weeks, of benefits are payable to persons who continue to be out of work after 6 months, 26 weeks, of regular benefits paid under the State unemployment compensation program. That is a total of 9 months of unemployment compensation benefits. In my opinion, that should be the maximum responsibility for the Nation's unemployment compensation program.

Economic studies have demonstrated that the length of time that claimants collect benefits rises as the available duration of benefits is extended. Obviously, claimants tend to delay serious job search efforts until benefits are nearly exhausted.

The proposed additional 13 weeks of benefits would be financed totally out of general revenues—thereby contributing to the deficit, by at least $1 billion in fiscal year 1982 through fiscal year 1983.

Not only would there be a large Federal budget impact, but costs of the existing unemployment insurance system would rise as claimants receiving regular State benefits delay taking new jobs. State unemployment trust funds are already seriously overburdened. Many are running in the red. The States would be forced to either raise taxes on the employers or borrow from the Federal Treasury to pay the increased cost of the regular and extended benefit program.

The adverse financial effect of Federal supplemental benefits during the 1970's is further illustrated by the findings of a recent tax foundation study. That study indicated that the extended and supplemental benefit programs added about 30 percent to the costs of the regular program. I would remind my colleagues that the regular State programs are financed totally through taxes on employers in that State.

The experience of the Federal supplemental benefits program of the mid-1970's also demonstrates the fact that the increased claims load and longer availability of benefits kept the State administrative agencies from providing adequate job market services.

Extending unemployment benefits to a year's duration transforms the program from short-term income maintenance to something like welfare. The example of the Federal supplemental benefits program illustrates the problems of extending benefit duration to relatively long periods of time. The unemployment compensation program developed the same types of bureaucratic flaws and abuses that are a feature of welfare.

Because of the advent of the two wage-earner family and other demographic changes, the insured unemployment rate of 4 percent or 5 percent in the current State triggers no longer represents the emergency that would warrant a costly extension of benefit duration.

In more than half the U.S. households with an unemployed husband, another family member has a job, according to the Labor Department. A recent Department study found that a typical autoworker's family income falls comparatively little, from an average of $25,000 to $20,000 a year, when he is laid off; wives or children take jobs and the autoworker receives jobless benefits and other assistance.

So I would urge my colleagues to oppose the amendment. The Finance Committee will study the various bills and take action.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 3 minutes since the time is used up in the quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. What was the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the Senator be recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will yield the Senator 3 minutes on the bill.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana.

This amendment—I will repeat it—is very simple and elementary. I was one of those few, in fact, who voted on this side of the aisle for the FUTA tax yesterday. I think there was need for the FUTA tax, but the fact is I think there is also a need for extended unemployment benefits to be increased an additional 13 weeks, and this is the only provision in the bill that would provide any help to unemployed workers in this country.

It is an amendment supported by the AFL-CIO; it is an amendment supported by unemployed workers throughout the country.

It does not affect the validity of the FUTA tax but merely provides that the FUTA tax shall not become effective with respect to any calendar year in which it would otherwise apply unless prior to January 1, 1983, which would certainly give the Finance Committee plenty of time to act, there has been enacted into law a program which will become effective in calendar year 1982 for the additional 13 weeks.

I think it is a reasonable approach. I think it should be pointed out that the House has already recommended from the committee a bill to extend unemployment benefits for an additional 13 weeks.

I yield to the Senator from West Virginia the remainder of my time.

WE NEED SUPPLEMENTAL UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I rise today to support the amendment that has been proposed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM. The Senator from Ohio correctly has pointed out to this body that the reconciliation bill before us today contains increases in the Federal unemployment tax that over the next 5 years will total $12 billion.

And yet, Mr. President, this bill, which touches in some way virtually every program within the jurisdiction of the Senate Finance Committee, does not provide one thin dime to the 10.4 million persons who currently are unemployed and either have exhausted or soon will exhaust their regular and extended unemployment benefits.

The economic statistics irrefutably demonstrate that this Nation entered into the current recession in July of last year. Ironically, this recession, that began 6 months after the current administration took office, officially commenced within a few days of enactment by Congress of the administration's supply-side economic program. The record is unassailable: Since that day, the recession has only grown more serious. Despite almost daily claims by administration spokesmen that "we are about to turn the corner" toward economic progress, we remain mired in a national economy tragedy.

The administration's economic program has failed to date. As David Stockman revealed in his statements to William Greider last fall, it is now and always has been only a Trojan Horse to sneak the old philosophy of "trickle down" economics into law.

Voodoo economics has extracted a terrible price in human misery. Nowhere can this be seen more clearly than in the unemployment statistics. In the Labor Department's report last month, 10½ million people were counted as unemployed—and that is on a seasonally adjusted basis. President Reagan has said he does not believe the world is seasonally adjusted. If one takes the raw figures, 10.9 million were counted as unemployed—over 9.8 percent of the workforce. This, of course, does not count the rapidly increasing number of discouraged workers who have failed in their efforts to find work for so long that they simply have given up looking; there are over 1.5 million of these. Nor does it count the several hundred thousand workers who have been forced to work only part time because they are not able to secure full time work. It is these people who are the most serious casualties of the current recession, Mr. President.

What has the administration done to help these people? I am distressed to say that the administration proposed and the Congress accepted billions of dollars in reductions in unemployment insurance benefits within the Reconciliation Act of 1981. And the unemployed have felt only the tip of that iceberg—because some of the harshest reductions have been lying dormant for a year, and will not take effect until late September, when hundreds of thousands of persons will lose eligibility for extended benefits.

How does this record contrast with the way in which previous administrations—and the Senate when it was under Democratic control—dealt with recessions when unemployment was higher than normal—although considerably lower than today?

In 1971, Mr. President, there were 5.1 million unemployed persons, and the unemployment rate was 5.5 percent. In 1974, the next significant recession, the unemployment rate reached 7.2 percent and 6.6 million persons were out of work. During each of those times, a temporary program of supplemental benefits was enacted—increasing from 39 weeks to 52 weeks, and in one case 65 weeks, the period during which the unemployed are eligible for unemployment benefits.

On May 18 of this year, with 21 original cosponsors, I introduced a bill to establish a temporary supplemental benefits program: S. 2542. Although it is not the ultimate solution to the problem of unemployment, I think it is an essential step that a compassionate nation must take when a tenth of its work force has been idled by a recession.

What has happened in the 2 months that have passed since then? Unemployment has risen even further. Thousands more people have exhausted their unemployment benefits. And nothing has been done with the bill I introduced or with any similar measure here in the Senate. The House Ways and Means Committee, on the other hand, has reported a bill such as this twice—and, in fact, attached its bill to the House companion for the very bill we are considering here today.

I am advised that the Senate Finance Committee now has set hearings on this bill in Washington and in several other cities at the end of this month. I intend to testify. But those hearings, and the testimony I and others will offer, will not provide so much as a penny of badly needed assistance to even one unemployed person.

How bad does the unemployment situation have to get before the administration thinks it is bad enough to do something about it? How many more millions of persons must lose their jobs, and lose their unemployment benefits, before the majority in the Senate concludes that we must do something? How much longer must we wait?

But most troubling of all is the fact that we have no assurance whatsoever that the Senate Finance Committee ever intends to report supplemental benefits legislation.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I will support the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, and will urge my colleagues to support it as well. While this bill has been under consideration by the Senate, I have supported amendments that would delete the increase in the Federal unemployment tax, because I think now—while businesses are struggling, and before we even begin an economic recovery that must include hiring back millions of unemployed workers—is the worst possible time to increase the costs to employers of hiring workers. If there are other amendments to delete or delay this tax increase at this time, I expect to support them. But if we fail in our efforts to delete or delay this tax increase, I believe it is essential that we obtain an ironclad commitment that we will not limit our actions to returning the unemployment insurance trust fund to a stable posture, but that we also will do something for unemployed people in this country who daily are losing their homes, their life savings, and their self-respect. The Senate must act on supplemental benefits legislation, and it must act promptly. This is nothing less than an obligation to 10½ million unemployed persons and their families.

Consequently, Mr. President, I will support this amendment.

EMK STATEMENT ON METZENBAUM AMENDMENT/ UNEMPLOYMENT TAX

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. Yesterday, this body failed to adopt the amendment offered by Senator BENTSEN to delete the provisions in the bill which increased the unemployment taxes exmployers have to pay. That amendment failed by three votes in its effort to protect small businesses from increased Federal taxes.

The pending amendment is designed to protect workers and their families from the ravaging effects of high unemployment. Last month the Department of Labor reported that 10,400,000 Americans are out of work—almost 2 million more than last year. Yesterday, the Department released a report that 1 of every 5 Americans has been unemployed for a period of time in the last year.

The most important program available to help these workers during their extended joblessness is unemployment insurance. But these benefits are running out for thousands of men and women who have run out of work for extended periods of time.

Senator METZENBAUM'S amendment would authorize the Finance Committee to develop a supplemental benefits program to give unemployed workers who have exhausted their benefits an additional 13 weeks of income.

Without such a program, many of these workers will be forced to go on welfare. They have already exhausted their savings, and many have sold their cars and furniture so that their families can survive. These funds could mean the difference between keeping their homes and having the banks foreclose.

In past recessions, Presidents of both parties have recognized the need to provide additional weeks of unemployment benefits to the long-term unemployed. Job programs have also been available to ease the pain of recession.

This is the first time in the last 25 years that the Government has failed to respond with temporary help to relieve the plight of the unemployed.

I urge my colleagues in the name of compassion and fair play to support this amendment. Working men and women who have lost their jobs through no fault of their own need our help now.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Senator HARRY F. BYRD, JR.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. As I understand the statement just made by the Senator from Kansas he is opposed to this amendment?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It will be an expensive amendment. It would add to the cost of the program, and the chairman of the Committeee on Finance is opposed to the amendment, is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. I am opposed to the amendment at this time. I oppose the amendment.

We do have hearings scheduled for a week from today. I acted as quickly as the Senator from West Virginia made the request to schedule hearings.

It is $700 million to $1 billion in cost. I am very sympathetic to what the Senator from Ohio wishes to do, but I hope we can do it in an orderly way, have hearings next Thursday, and maybe we can report out something that will satisfy most everyone in the Senate.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It would have a $1 billion increase in cost of Government, and we should take a little time.

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I think we ought to have at least 1 hour's hearing. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I had intended to offer two amendments to the committee bill which would have deleted the committee's proposed changes in the tax treatment of State and municipal obligations. I believe those changes were essential——

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARN). The Senator is correct. The Senate is not in order. The longer there is noise, the longer it will take to finish this evening's session. I suggest to Senators that they cease their conversations. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to be heard.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I believe that those changes that I had intended to offer were essential to protect one of our cities' very last options to finance their massive capital needs in the coming decades.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement describing those amendments and the need for them be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The committee bill reduces from 100 to 85 percent the amount of interest that financial institutions can deduct in connection with their purchase of tax-exempt municipal obligations acquired after December 31, 1982. The committee bill also includes interest earned on municipal bonds as a new preference item in the alternative individual minimum tax.

In short, Mr. President, the bill before us proposes to eliminate the feature that makes these securities attractive to both corporate and individual investors. My amendments would reverse that decision.

The provisions in the committee bill have been described as simply the elimination of tax advantages for banks and wealthy investors.

That is true . . . but it is only a partial truth.

If that were the whole story, Mr. President, I wouldn't be here. Or maybe I would be here trying to find a way to strengthen what the committee had done.

But the real losers are not wealthy corporations or individuals. The victims of the committee action were the cities of the United States and their citizens. And they are victimized at absolutely the worst possible time. We have already taken away from America's cities virtually every financial resource they had to maintain their economic infrastructure and make capital improvements. About the only thing they have left is their borrowing power. The bill before us proposes to tax that power and thereby cripple one of their last resorts.

Mr. President, the cities cannot afford it and the Nation cannot afford it.

Here is what we have already done to American cities:

Since 1980, we have cut community development block grants by $300 million.

We have cut UDAG by $235 million.

EDA has been halved.

Mass transit—down $1.2 billion.

Highway assistance—down $440 million.

Sewer construction grants—cuts of $1.2 billion.

And it is going to get worse. The budget resolution we recently adopted slates housing assistance for a $9 billion cut.

In my judgment, Mr. President, we will soon rue the day that we made those decisions.

However, I am not here to complain about those decisions or to try to re-open old battles. But I do think the time has come to say that enough is enough.

It is a fact that those programs are either reduced, decimated, or gone completely. It is a fact that borrowing by issuing bonds is one of the few remaining financial options of municipal governments. It is a fact that if we alter the tax advantages covered by those securities their attractiveness to investors would be ruined.

In fact, Mr. President, it is possible to do a cost-benefit analysis of those provisions in the bill.

The benefits: the federal government will have a revenue gain of about $150 million in the first year—by the most generous estimate.

The cost: state and local government will have added borrowing costs of about $1 billion.

In other words, for every dollar the federal government gains, state and local governments would pay $6.60. If that is the "new federalism," it is time to go back to the old version.

The reason for the effect I have described is fairly obvious, Mr. President. If the interest on municipal bonds becomes even partially taxable, they lose much of their competitive status for investors compared with other opportunities.

The only option state and local governments would have would be to raise the interest paid on their obligations.

The Municipal Finance Officers' Association estimates that as tax-exempt issues become less attractive relative to other investments, the yield on tax-exempts will increase by between 1.25 and 1.5 percent in order to attract banks and individuals to the new issue market. This increase in rates will result in higher first year, tax exempt borrowing costs by conservative estimates of $1 billion. This must be considered against the first year revenue gain from this proposal of at the very most $150 million. In the case of long-term bonds, these increased costs would extend in the future each year the bonds are outstanding and be added to the additional cost associated with the new issues.

Mr. President, it is not a good bargain.

Who will pay for those increased costs, Mr. President? There are really two answers.

First, the middle-income residents of our cities will pay them in higher local taxes—usually of property, sales, and other regressive varieties.

Second, our cities will pay them in deteriorating infrastructure. Tax exempt bonds build public schools, maintain mass transportation systems, construct roads, and bridges, bring water supplies to city residents, and keep sewers and waste disposal systems operating.

Even with the availability to tax exempt bonds, the ability of cities to maintain those essential services is open to serious questions. Whether American cities have a future remains to be seen.

It is estimated that at least one-half and maybe two-thirds of our communities cannot undertake modernized development until major investments are made in their basic facilities, given the major reductions over the past two years in direct federal assistance programs which I have already cited, any increase in local borrowing costs will only speed this deteriorization and add to the already staggering future costs of maintaining this nation's life support systems. Whether or not tax-exempt financing is the most efficient means for addressing these problems, for the present, it is about the only thing that is available.

The provisions in the bill pull the plug on the major financial life support systems of our cities. The small gain in revenues simply does not justify the disastrous consequences for state and local governments. We can avoid that disaster by adopting these amendments.

Mr. DODD. It is clear, Mr. President, that those amendments, however, could not receive majority support. Therefore, I am offering a revised amendment that makes at least a partial restoration of the ability of State and local governments to attract investors to projects constructing improvements in the public infrastructure. Frankly, we ought to do more. But this amendment will go a small way toward restoring our urban economic health.

It represents, in my judgment, a significant improvement over the committee provisions.

Let me describe very briefly, Mr. President, if I can, what the amendment I have sent to the desk does. Under the committee bill, interest on tax-exempt obligations of State and local governments is included as a new preference item for purposes of the individual alternative minimum tax. This revised amendment deletes from the application of the minimum tax interest on tax-exempt general-obligation and revenue bonds issued by public bodies for the purpose of providing public facilities and capital expenditures in connection with the delivery of governmental services. That is what this amendment does.

As I mentioned at the outset, Mr. President, I had wanted us to go further because, frankly, after we have substantially reduced Federal expenditures to assist our cities, counties, and States with needed infrastructure dollars to improve highways, sewage systems, water systems, this is the last resort that many of our localities will have to finance needed capital improvements in their communities.

I had intended to offer amendments, as I mentioned at the outset, that would have been broader in their application. But I recognize at this late hour that we cannot do all of the things all of us would like to do. I am grateful to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the ranking minority member of the committee for their advice and counsel on this new amendment. It is, I think, a step in the right direction. I think it will provide some needed relief for our cities and our communities that are desperately trying to provide for new capital improvements.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. DODD. Before yielding to my good friend, if I may, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators ZORINSKY, HEFLIN, and MOYNIHAN be added as cosponsors of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana explained yesterday and put into the RECORD a substantial amount of information to explain why he was opposed to taxing State and municipal bond interest. I, like the Senator from Connecticut, would like to strike everything in the bill which would tax the bonds of State and municipal governments. But though I would like to do that, Mr. President, I doubt very much that we can succeed unless we are able to persuade the leadership on the Republican side of the aisle to go along with us on this matter.

So far, the chairman of the committee, with the support of his colleagues, has not lost on an amendment he wanted to defeat. My guess is that unless we can persuade him to see our point, we are not going to prevail on this matter. We were able to work out a compromise with the Treasury and with the chairman of the committee, and they are willing to go along with the proposal that we are now offering. Our amendment would exempt from the minimum tax on individuals the tax-exempt obligations of State and municipal governments.

The exemption does not include industrial development bonds, nor does it include mortgage subsidy bonds, but it does take care of the full-fledged obligations and the revenue bonds of the State and local governments.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this amendment protects the principle of the immunity of one level of government from taxation by another. That, to me, is a very important principle.

This amendment is in the nature of a compromise. I would have liked to go further. But I think this is the best that can be done under the circumstances.

Mr. President, I thank the chairman of the committee for his consideration in this matter. I recommend to the Senate that it agree to the amendment. I think it is the best we can do under the circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, who controls time on this side?

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the committee is going to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut with some reservations, at least by the Senator from Missouri. I would like to explain briefly the concept behind this portion of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. DANFORTH. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator, if he is in agreement with the amendment, who is going to control time against the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time is controlled by the majority leader or his designee. If the manager of the bill does not——

Mr. STEVENS. With due respect to my friend from Missouri, there are some of us opposed to this amendment, and I would not like to see the time used up by people who support the amendment. I would like to see that the Senator from New York and the Senator from Mississippi and I have some time to talk about this, because it is going to eliminate an amendment that we thought we had worked out already. I would like to have the time for opposition to this amendment reserved for those who oppose the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that it is up to the majority leader or his designee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, my understanding is that the time on this side was designated on the opening day of debate to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is up to the chairman of the Finance Committee to designate who controls the time in opposition to and the minority manager who controls it in favor of the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the amendments are now limited to 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. How much time is remaining on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Some 8 minutes and 59 seconds to the proponents and 13 minutes to the opponents.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I can see that we have about maybe a dozen amendments left and some are going to require extensive debate. I would be willing to yield some time in opposition. We have not done anything with this amendment that was not already in the bill. We have a lot of bond lawyers outside who have been knocking on people's doors. That is what has happened.

Mr. STEVENS. This Senator has not talked to any bond lawyers, but he is a pretty good lawyer himself. He can read. I want some time in opposition and I am sure the Senator from New York does and the Senator from Mississippi as well.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished Senator from Kansas I certainly would like to make an observation with regard to this amendment. I do not think it is going to take a great deal of time.

Mr. DOLE. I would be happy to yield 10 minutes. That leaves about 5 minutes on the bill. That leaves about 10 minutes to the Senator from Alaska, the Senator from New York.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I would be happy to take 5 minutes and that is it. As far as I am concerned, if I could have 5 minutes, Senator STEVENS could have the rest of the time on this side, or the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), or whoever would like it.

With that understanding, Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I think some facts are in order, but first of all, the rationale of this particular provision in the bill.

Last year, when we passed the tax bill, a lot of people said this is a rich person's bill, the whole idea of the 1981 Tax Act was to try to confer benefits on the wealthy. The response to that, of course, is that there is no justification in any tax bill to try to confer benefits on the wealthy. The point of any tax program is to try to get the economy moving in the right direction. That was the theory behind the tax bill of 1981.

This bill, I think, gives further ammunition to those who would argue that the tax program we embarked on in 1981 was not designed to favor a few individuals but was, in fact, a program of economic recovery—because this is truly a tax reform program aimed at a very small portion of the taxpayers of this country who pay virtually no tax at all on very large incomes.

As a matter of fact, this alternative minimum tax would affect a total of 280,000 individual taxpayers out of a grand total of about 75 million to 78 million individual taxpayers. It is not a tax on bonds. It is not a tax on industrial development bonds. It is not a tax on tax shelters. It is an alternative minimum tax. It says that when a taxpayer computes his tax liability, he also computes an alternative tax, and the alternative tax does not kick in until after deductions for mortgage interest, charitable contributions, medical and casualty losses, the individual, if he is married, has an income of over $40,000 a year, and then over the $40,000, between $40,000 and $60,000 the rate is only 10 percent, and over $60,000 it is only 20 percent. That is the theory of the alternative minimum tax.

Now, the argument has been made that this is going to have some effect on the bond market. That is the point of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, but I would point this out, that with respect to the bond market 75 percent of the bonds that are sold in this country are not sold to individuals. Some 75 percent of the bonds that are sold are sold to nonindividuals, to banks, to corporations, and so on. And of the 25 percent that are sold to individuals, an estimated 10 percent of that 25 percent or about 2½ percent are sold to individuals who would be covered by the alternative minimum tax.

As a matter of act, the purchase of tax-free bonds would make no sense at all to a person who paid no tax. It would only make sense to a person who was in a bracket which would require a 20-percent tax. Then it would make sense for a person to have the revenue that would be incurred by buying a tax-free bond.

Mr. President, the effect of this would be zero on the bond market, but out of deferrence to the Senator from Connecticut and the worries that were created in the minds of the Governors and others that maybe there would be some psychological effect, I was willing to agree on my part to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LONG. As I understand it, the Senator from New York could use the remainder of the time on the amendment. There is no need to yield time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I have labored long and arduously among a majority of this Senate to attempt to get the Treasury Department's thinking in conformance with a majority of this body. That is not too easy. Sometimes it is rather difficult, and sometimes when we think that we have worked out an agreement with the leadership and those who are handling this bill, we find out that the Treasury Department after signing off has another way of coming around to skin the cat, so to speak, and so it is with this amendment.

I compliment my learned colleague from Connecticut, because this is a good amendment except that it does not go far enough. The Treasury Department must have said to him, "If you want our support, you must drop out industrial revenue bonds." They know full well what that does. It creates an inferior bond.

People may say, "Well, that in the Finance Committee version anyway," knowing full well that we had an agreement with respect to industrial revenue bonds. An agreement which moved back the sunset date, created a new schedule for acclerated depreciation, and in fact struck a compromise. I should have listened to my good friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) who said, "We have the votes, let's take them on."

Well, I would like to mention that as far as I am concerned that agreement does not stand. I keep my word, and I would expect that the leadership and those people who are part and parcel of this agreement would do what is honorable, do what is rights and not come in the back door and make the industrial revenue bonds inferior, because that is what they are going to be. I would just as soon have an up or down vote on the IDB's. That is what I am going to ask for later on. I am going to submit the original amendment to strike the Finance Committee proposal.

Let me mention something else. Members of the Finance Committee say, "We have got to stick together, don't offer amendments," but they offer amendments when they want and move them at their pleasure. I would like my chance.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. D'AMATO. I certainly will.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time remains in opposition, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four minutes and thirty seconds.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me just take 2 minutes to explain my problem. I have been working along with the Senator from New York and others, and also with my friend from Louisiana, with regard to this amendment in terms of the minimum tax. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut as drafted is that income an individual has from IDB's will be taxed but income that an individual has from general obligation bonds will not be taxed.

With a weak municipal bond market to begin with, no one is going to buy IDB's. So the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is to try what Senator STENNIS and Senator D'AMATO and many have been working on here for 2 or 3 days, trying to find a middle ground in terms of the IDB's. We had just worked it out, I say to Senators, about 30 minutes ago. I must say my friend from Mississippi is not too happy with it and neither are we, but we had worked it out and now this amendment destroys its validity because no one will buy IDB's if your income is going to be taxed when, under the minimum concept, you can buy general obligation bonds that are nontaxable, as opposed to IDB's.

I think the case is there. The gentleman from Connecticut has not gone far enough. We hoped that he would go to the extent that the Senator from Louisiana discussed with us, and there would be no problem about it because there should not be inequality in municipals. The market is too soft, and no one is going to buy IDB's if this passes.

Now, I say to my good friend from Louisiana, I said I would support his amendment. I cannot support this. I hope the Senate does not support it, because it is creating such an inequity that those people who are trying to market IDB's will not be able to do it. I yield any time I have remaining to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may I ask someone to yield me 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may I have 5 minutes?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would like to speak to this matter briefly, if I may.

Mr. President, if Senators want to have taxed every kind of State obligation that can be taxed, then they should vote down this amendment. If they do vote it down, we will be left with the committee amendment under which the minimum tax will apply to all kinds of State obligations. If the individual's income falls under that minimum tax, he will pay the minimum tax of either 10 or 20 percent as the case may be on all kinds of State obligations.

Now, Mr. President, there had been a doctrine, generally recognized since the beginning of this Nation, of reciprocal immunity: the Federal Government would not tax the State governments and the States would not have power to tax the Federal Government without its consent. We would seek to protect that doctrine.

As far as these general obligations and revenue bonds are concerned, their interest would be exempt from the individual minimum tax. But as for the housing subsidy bonds and the industrial development bonds, the Treasury, and most members of the committee, too, are not willing to exempt those kinds of bonds from the minimum tax on individuals. Only 25 percent of those bonds are held by individuals.

Mr. President, up to this point the Senate has not voted to tax a State government itself, and when you tax the interest on a State bond, you are taxing the State itself. The principle of not taxing the State itself is one we would protect if this amendment is agreed to.

If the amendment is not agreed to, Mr. President, we will be taxing the State itself, and I fail to see how we are then going to exempt industrial development bonds.

So far as I am concerned, let the people who want to do something for industrial development bonds offer their amendment in their own right and have it considered on its merits.

We have an agreement with the chairman of the committee and with the Treasury that they are willing to exempt the full faith and credit bonds of the States and municipalities. If you do not get some relief for the obligations of the States, what they are directly obligated for, you will not be able to get relief for anything.

If the Senate votes this amendment down, you will be struck with the situation that there is no help for the States, no help whatever, and in due course they will be taxed like any other taxpayer. I hope that will not happen.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this amendment is subject to amendment, as I understand it. Why do we not go back to the amendment that the Senator from Louisiana discussed with us and make the municipals not subject to the minimum tax?

Mr. LONG. If this amendment is agreed to, the States and localities will be in better shape than they were to start with under the committee bill. If the amendment is agreed to, there will still be ways for the Senator to amend the bill further. He should go ahead and offer his amendment then.

I have been around here quite some time on this bill and I have seen that the chairman of this committee has not been defeated on anything, and I doubt that he is going to be. Since he is willing to go along with this amendment, we should get it agreed to. If this amendment is not agreed to, there will be no help for the States with regard to anything in this bill.

As far as I am concerned, we have done as much as we can do. Under the committee bill all kinds of State obligations would be subject to tax, including industrial development bonds. After negotiating, we arrived at an agreement that the Treasury was willing to go along with, and my impression is that the chairman of the committee was also willing to go along with it.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield the Senator 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I do not know of anything that is more complicated than a tax question.

Here, at the end of the consideration of this bill, with all the complications that go with different kinds of taxes, this amendment, so far as we are concerned, was a complete surprise. We have been working all day regarding the provision in the bill with reference to revenue bonds, over a 50-year policy, language in the bill that terminates them within a couple of years. I was opposed to that, as were several members of the majority and some in the minority, and we have worked out what I think is going to be a very practical solution to the matter, so far as this bill is concerned.

I was yielding as much as, if not more than, anyone else. I have been talking to the leaders, and this is a total surprise, to come in at the very last minute with this. I cannot conceive of our doing a more confused act than to try to pass on these matters.

Could we not at least pass on this well developed, well known subject, which is rather simple and would not take long—the provisions in the present bill that the committee passed with reference to these revenue bonds?

Let us pass on that and settle it. Then, if something else has to be done, let us take it in an orderly way, where there is some chance for it to be understood. Otherwise, I submit that this is total confusion, and I do not believe that the manager of the bill or the Senator from Louisiana would want this to happen.

So let us go back to the fundamentals and pass on this other matter, which is not going to be settled in accordance with my wishes, but I am going to agree to something in it.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, may we have order? We cannot hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senate is not in order.

Mr. STENNIS. I appeal particularly to those who are handling the bill: Let us pass on this first amendment which has been worked up and considered and is easily understood. It relates to present law. Let us pass on that. Then, if we have to take up another one, all right.

I have never seen anyone treated this way with reference to a pending matter that is already in a bill and everybody knows what it means. I hope that order can prevail.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, does any time remain to the proponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, 5 minutes and 3 seconds.

Who yields time?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3½ or 4 minutes?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, has been said about confusion is absolutely right. After raising the cigarette taxes, the telephone excise taxes, and a variety of other taxes affecting State and local governments we are only now getting asked what kind of impacts those decisions will have on State and local governments.

The question now is the minimum tax on tax-exempt bonds. Tax-exempt bonds are not only the municipal bonds that the Senator from Alaska is talking about. Municipal bonds are used to build highways, streets, schools, waterworks, sewers, bridges, mass transit, and parks facilities. All the basic infrastructure under our cities was built with municipal bonds. And today those municipal bonds are in trouble.

They are in trouble, first, because the other part, the tax-exempt bond market, the private purpose side, has exploded. Fifty-five percent of the municipal market is now devoted not to those public purposes, but to private purposes. As a result the margin between the general obligation bond and the taxable corporate bond has narrowed. The spread used to be in the neighborhood of 30 percent ot 40 percent. That is how much was the interest advantage of tax-exempt bonds. Today, because of the flood of private purpose bonds in the market, the spread is something like 17 percent. What we are trying to do here is to provide a little breathing room for general obligation bonds.

In addition to growth in private purpose bonds, we have created other competing instruments like, IRA's, Keoghs, and all-savers certificates.

All we are asking by this amendment is whether or not it is proper to provide special relief for the tax-exempt bonds of State and local governments as opposed to the private purpose bonds. I think this amendment correctly draws that distinction. It does not ban industrial development bonds at all. It simply says that the general obligation bond will not be taxed.

Mr. DOLE. I yield myself 3 minutes on the bill.

Mr. President, I wonder if we might have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi and others. I hope I can explain the committee's role in all this. I think we may be in the middle of something here that might be just a big misunderstanding.

I was not in the negotiations. I walked in after things had been worked out, and I agreed to both agreements—the one made earlier by the distinguished Senator from New York and the Senator from Mississippi and others, and the one by the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Louisiana. I say that so that I will not be accused of trying to manipulate something or deceive someone.

The amendment would modify the provision of the individual minimum tax, which includes the hundreds of tax-exempt bonds, to apply only to industrial development bonds and mortgage subsidy bonds. As a result, interest earned on general obligation bonds and other bonds that are not used by a taxable person in a trade or business would not be considered a preference item.

The amendment loses some money, about $50 million, but that is the way we negotiate some of these things. People have different views. Statistics show that IDB's are crowding out bonds that are used for traditional purposes, as the Senator from Minnesota just pointed out, such as streets and schools.

This amendment takes these public purpose bonds out of the individual minimum tax, and that is all it does. It is only for this type of bond that the argument that the bond buyer pays a sort of de facto tax to the governmental borrower really makes any sense.

You can talk all day about mortgage bonds, industrial development bonds, and general obligation bonds, but we are talking about a minimum tax that applies to about 280,000 wealthy individuals in this country, maybe 250,000. We were trying to get some handle on it and make certain everybody gets to pay some tax in America, even the rich. Some have not done so for a long time. So we took this very difficult step, a very small step. That is really what the issue is.

Nothing has been done to disrupt the agreement on IDB's. I just say as far as the Treasury officials and the joint committee and the other committee no one went in there and made a deal that disrupted anyone's earlier deal. Nor is anything new in the bill. IDB's have been in the finance bill from the start. They simply remain in the bill.

I must say that I think everyone recognizes they have been in there all this time, and we have a lot of people, and I do not suggest anything improper, a lot of people around outside who suddenly say, "Oh, you cannot do this. We cannot have 280,000 rich people paying taxes. They do not know how to make out the return. They never paid tax before."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me some time off the bill?

Mr. DOLE. When I finish.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. The Senators in opposition had no problem when both IDB's and general obligation bonds were in the bill. What we do here is certainly no different. In fact, it is better. We carved out some obligations. I think that is better, not worse.

It does not, I might say again, as far as I understand, unless something happens in the agreement I was not a party to, disrupt anyone's agreement. I did not make the agreement. The parties negotiated the agreement and now they do not like the agreement. I cannot help it.

So under the committee bill, to the extent that it affects the market at all, it affects buyers of IDB's, too.

Senator LONG's amendment does not change that. Those bonds were in yesterday and they are in now, and nothing has been changed except I would say again to my colleagues we are here just about the 11th hour on this bill and one thing we want to try to retain if we can is a little equity in the bill.

There are a lot of people in this country who do not pay taxes. Some are poor and some are rich. It just seems to me what we have done is just a very small step.

I hope that we could work out the differences. I think once it is fully understood that no one got into anyone's agreement, I did not try to deceive anyone. I will stake my life on it. So I just suggest we go ahead and vote on this amendment and maybe we can figure out something that we should have figured out earlier.

If someone overlooked something do not blame me for it. We did not change anything.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes off the bill?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 minute?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wish to say this. If the Senators wants equity, then put the Government general obligation bonds back in because all this means is that if you are wealthy enough to make the investment decision, and I think anyone who has that kind of money can understand the difference in tax bills, just buy general obligation bonds and you will not pay any tax under the minimum tax—on this bond income. No one who is going to be considering a minimum tax implication is going to buy IDB's or mortgage subsidy bonds.

Mr. President, what that is, as the occupant of the chair knows, is housing bonds. All of the bonds that are issued by our housing agencies, our State housing agencies, that are included in income from those purchasing such bonds will be in the minimum tax. The income from IDB's will be a minimum tax preference. These individuals are the ones that provide jobs. They are the people who provide employment in the private sector for building homes, building docks, building small businesses. Income from IDB's and the mortgage subsidy bonds is going to be subject to taxation.

Mr. President, let me tell you I do not know if any one of you has been hit by the minimum tax. I did one year. I lost enough money that I had to go back and recompute what I should owe. It is an interesting thing what goes back in preference items.

This bill changes all of that. This is a new concept and the people who are rich enough are going to know the difference, and this is the death knell of IDB and of mortgage subsidy bonds.

It means that the municipal bond market is only going to be general obligation bonds and as far as I am concerned I will tell the Senator from New York any arrangement we made with the Treasury Department as far as I am concerned is off. I am sure the Senator from Mississippi feels the same way.

We have to go back to the original amendments on IDB's because this means we have to make IDB's even more attractive so that they can possibly have some market. They will have no market for the wealthy people after this. They have to be attractive enough for the not so wealthy people now and that means they have to have a further incentive.

We have to go back to the ACRS change that the committee wants to make. We have to go back in the sunset provision and go back in the other provisions that relate to IDB's because there will be no IDB market for those individuals who invest in IDB's once this passes.

If we are talking about equity, I say to my friend from Kansas, this is the most inequitable provision I have ever seen related to the bond market, and I cannot understand the arrangement that has been made.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield me several minutes for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, how much time remains? I do not know how much time remains.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Some 2 minutes and 24 seconds to the opponents of the amendment; 2 minutes and 32 seconds for the proponents.

Mr. DODD. The Senator has 2 minutes.

Mr. D'AMATO. All right.

Mr. President, I echo the sentiments of the distinguished colleague from Alaska.

I ask the committee chairman to report and include industrial revenue bonds in this amendment because I know the sponsors of it do not oppose that. We are not talking about great revenue losses. I think he said $30 million.

I ask that the Senator include industrial revenue bonds because the effect of this amendment will almost vitiate the compromise we have struck, and I also want to state that in no way should my remarks be taken to imply that the Senator from Kansas was less than honorable in working out that agreement, I know he sticks to his word. The Treasury Department, though, found another way to come and lower the effectiveness and use of industrial revenue bonds.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield time on the bill?

Mr. DOLE. There is another minute remaining to the opponents.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents have 2 minutes and 32 seconds.

Mr. DODD. Will the Senator yield a minute?

Mr. LONG. The Senator has time of the proponents.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, first of all, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it so ordered.

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by Senator DODD.

I support the amendment because it resolves some very serious intergovernmental problems caused by the proposed taxation of interest income of State and local bonds.

Were this provision of the tax bill approved, the Federal Government would place itself in the position of taxing State and local securities for the first time.

It is a basic constitutional principle that the States are immune from Federal taxation. Adoption of the provision would open the door for full-scale Federal taxation of State and local tax-exempt securities.

From its first decision in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U.S. 429 (1895) to the 1976 decision in National League of Cities v. Usery 426 U.S. 833, the Supreme Court has affirmed the immunity of States from Federal tax interference. To quote the National League decision: The imposition of a tax on securities now considered tax-exempt would "operate to directly displace the States' freedom to structure integral operations in ares of traditional governmental functions." The borrowing power of the States reflected in tax-exempt securities, is an essential component of the ability to conduct "traditional governmental functions."

Mr. President, if the committee's proposed tax on the interest income of State and local bonds were adopted, interest rates on these bonds will increase by as much as one-half percent. Now that one-half percent increase is going to cost Tennessee an estimated $82 to $98 million for all bonds issued in 1932. The Municipal Finance Officers Association estimates that the interest rate increase will cost State and local governments a total of $1.5 billion in the first year alone.

Let us look at the practical effects of the committee proposal on the citizens of this Nation. Tax-exempt bond issues now provide State and local government with the financing required to build new roads, replace or repair older highways, build bridges, and encourage industrial development among other things. But if we reject this Dodd amendment, where will the States get the financing required to undertake these essential services? From the taxpayer—through more regressive sales and property taxes, which require middle and lower income taxpayers to spend a higher percentage of their disposable income to meet their tax obligation.

Mr. President, the capital financing needs of State and local governments in the coming years are truly prodigious. Indeed, the recent issue of the Morgan Guaranty Survey for July 1982 indicates that by 1985, the funding gap for the financing of major public buildings, highways, sewer, water, and other essential public facilities may stand at $185 billion in real terms; that is, 1972 dollars. Such costs will only increase if the Senate Finance Committee's action on this matter is not reversed.

The committee proposal is of questionable constitutionality. It increases the costs of State and local capital financing, and it adds to the tax burdens of State and local taxpayers; therefore, I urge adoption of the amendment offered by Senator DODD.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Morgan Guaranty Survey for July 1982 article on this subject be printed in its entirety at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the Survey was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REBUILDING AMERICA'S INFRASTRUCTURE

A decade of neglect has left the nation's infrastructure—its roads, bridges, tunnels, water systems, public transport—in serious disrepair. Engineers estimate that the interstate highway system, which handles half of the nation's road traffic, is deteriorating at the rate of 2,000 miles per year—closing down lanes in many sections. Nearly half of the 560,000 bridges in the U.S. are inadequate or structurally deficient. New York's transit system is barely able to function. Houston faces mammoth traffic snarls; some of its waste-treatment facilities are strained. Many areas of the Sunbelt face major problems of water supply. Sewer lines in many Midwest areas hinder industrial and residential growth.

Crumbling facilities are beginning to take a toll. Increasingly, people across the country are experiencing service disruptions, congestion, and delays. The result is reduced efficiency, stunted productivity, and rising costs. Indeed, the decay of public facilities is beginning to undermine the private sector, is starting to raise a barrier to economic growth, and is threatening U.S. competitiveness in the export market. Most European nations and Japan, in contrast, have maintained high levels of infrastructure investment. France, for example, has improved its rail roadbeds to handle a train that can speed 250 miles per hour between Paris and Lyon. Fortunately, U.S. officials are increasingly aware of the size and complexity of the problem—a vital first step in marshaling public support for a rebuilding program.

Deterioration of public facilities is the result of a dramatic cutback in capital spending by states and localities—both on new projects and on repair and maintenance of aging facilities. During the 1950's and most of the 1960's, state and local nonresidential investment (in constant 1972 dollars) grew at a brisk rate to a peak of $22 billion in the late 1960's. Such outlays more than kept up with the growing population. But a subsequent decline had by the end of the 1970's reduced public-facility outlays to a fraction of the earlier spending pace.

Some of this cutback reflected completion of the interstate highway system and reduced needs for educational facilities following a decline in the growth of the school-age population during the late 1960's and early 1970's. Even when these factors are taken into account, however, the growth of public spending showed a sizable decline during most of the 1970's (bottom panel of chart on page 12).

The significance of such sharply reduced spending on public facilities is shown in the table on page 13. As the top line indicates, spending on state and local structures—adjusted to account for slowing in the growth of spending on highways and schools during the Seventies—rose at an average annual rate of 2.4 percent between 1950 and 1980. In the past two years, however, such outlays rose at a mere 0.7 percent rate, below the growth rate of the population. During this period, investment in public facilities has sagged a cumulative $25 billion (in constant 1972 dollars) below what it would have been if the adjusted growth trend had been maintained. If this pattern continues, the constant-dollar "gap" in spending for public facilities will widen to $182 billion by 1985* (right column in table). In current dollars, this would be equivalent to $500 billion—or five interstate highway systems.

BEHIND THE SAG

The cutback in spending can be traced in part to changing priorities. With the advent of the "Great Society" in the mid-1960's, all levels of government began to shift emphasis away from capital projects and toward social-welfare programs. At the federal level, for instance, construction grants as a share of total grants to states and localities fell from 44 percent in the early 1960's to 25 percent by the late 1970's. Other factors also played a part in holding down spending on public facilities. Among them:

Credit restraint. The increased use of monetary policy to reduce inflation—together with attendant rises in interest rates—has been a key factor. In contrast to the 1960's, when a low rate of inflation and stable interest rates permitted states and localities to raise funds for capital projects in the bond market, credit restraints over much of the past decade created an inhospitable climate for such borrowing. As a result, spending on capital projects sagged (chart at top of page 14).

During the past two-and-a-half years, moreover, high and volatile interest rates have caused state and local governments to postpone trips to the long-term debt market. Instead, they have turned increasingly to the short-term market through the issuance of bond-anticipation notes and tax-exempt commercial paper.

This shift to shorter maturities reflects a decision by state and local officials to carry on capital projects with short-term funds in the hope that long-term rates will fall. While long-term rates in recent months have eased somewhat from last year's levels, lately they have backed up again. In this climate, budget and financial planners remain reluctant to issue long-term debt at historically high rates. This reluctance—together with increased congestion in the short-term market—has had a depressing effect on all but the most essential capital projects.

Budget squeeze. Sluggish economic growth (which depressed state and local revenues from income and sales taxes) and a wave of tax-and-expenditure limitations that swept the country in the late Seventies also played a part in slowing spending for public facilities. Many jurisdictions, forced to adjust their budgets to meet essential services, curbed capital outlays. The capital budget typically is the first to be pared in any adjustment, since operating budgets have much larger and more vocal constituencies.

Federal grants. Even more important, the poor performance of public investment during the past decade also reflects swings in federal grants-in-aid—opening the spigot, turning it off, then opening it again. In an attempt to hold down federal spending, President Nixon early in the 1970s impounded funds appropriated by Congress (especially for highway and sewer construction). That restraint faded as revenue-sharing funds began to flow in 1973. During the 1974–75 recession, however, many states and localities funneled an increasing portion of revenue-sharing funds into income-support programs (such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children) and scaled back spending on capital projects. To offset these cutbacks, Congress passed a public-works grants program in 1976. But in the late 1970's, lawmakers—concerned about inflation and the budget deficit—cut back that program. More recently, cutbacks in construction grants have proceeded at an accelerated pace in response to the Reagan Administration's policy of spending restraint. The resulting yo-yo pattern in federal grants, shown in the chart at bottom of page 14, has disrupted capital-spending plans in countless communities.

In addition, Washington's regulatory procedures—aimed at monitoring state and local use of federal grants—often have had disruptive effects. While review of projects financed by the federal government is appropriate, the cumbersome process too frequently has resulted in lengthy construction delays and escalating project costs.

WHAT TO DO

Clearly, repairing this country's crumbling infrastructure—and stemming further decay of public facilities—will be a huge task requiring massive resources. The repair bill for the nation's bridges alone, according to Transportation Department estimate, is $47 billion in current dollars. The bill for years of neglect in other areas is similarly large. Where will the money come from?

In May, President Reagan decided against seeking a proposed five-cent-a-gallon increase in the federal tax on gasoline. The $5 billion of revenue that such a tax would raise each year was to have gone for highway and bridge repair and for mass transit.

Despite the loss of revenue entailed, the President's decision is undertandable. A gas tax increase, an unpopular move even in a non-election year, would have had the undesirable effect of raising consumer prices at a time when official policy is aimed at reducting inflation. The task ahead, moreover, has grown beyond merely raising federal gasoline taxes a few pennies. In fact, the burden of financing improvements in public facilities cannot be left to the federal government; states and localities need to shoulder most of the load.

Even so, there is room for improvement in the federal role. An important step would be for Congress to set up a public construction trust fund—financed by excise or other consumption taxes. The aim of such a fund should be to provide a more stable flow of federal grants to states and localities—reducing the uncertainties and disruptions associated with the swings in federal financing of the past decade. Such stabilization would encourage communities to undertake long-term, capital-intensive porjects and better enable them to finance such projects in the bond market.

In addition, a national capital budget—which would set priorities for the rebuilding task—is an urgent need. It should be included in the regular budget submitted by the President each January. In conjunction with drawing up a national capital budget, the Administration should review federal regulatory procedures with the aim of streamlining the grant-approval process.

Similarly, efforts to improve state and local performance should include creation of capital-budget commissions to coordinate public-works activities at those levels of government. Even more important is the need for these units to come to grips with the financing of capital projects. During the past year, many state and local governments have levied new user fees to cover the costs of providing various public services, ranging from water delivery to recreational activities. In addition, many states are planning to extend the use of tolls on bridges and highways. User fees and the resulting flow of revenues should help to maintain access to credit markets for many of those jurisdictions.

Still, in many cases review of existing state and local taxes is needed to determine if they are achieving their original aim. Many states, for example, rely on vehicle-registration fees to finance highway improvements. Since these fees often are based on the weight of the auto, revenues have remained stable or have declined as cars have become smaller and lighter. To increase revenues, registration fees could be based on the sale price of the vehicle.

Recently, some jurisdictions have attempted to increase their cash flow by using sale/lease back arrangements in which governmental units sell off property and lease it back. In addition, increased use is being made of grant-anticipation notes, letters of credit, zero-coupon bonds, and floating-rate bonds. Despite the proliferation of these financial innovations, however, states and localities will have to rely for the most part on traditional means of finance, such as general obligation and enterprise bonds.

*The long-run growth rate of 2.4 percent used to derive the gap is conservative by historical standards. For example, during the 1925–40 period, spending on public facilities rose at an average annual rate of 4.3 percent—slightly higher than the 1950–80 growth rate of 3.8 percent (unadjusted for the slowdown in spending on highways and schools in the Seventies).

Such sources are especially suited to those areas where the needs are the greatest—municipal buildings, streets, and conservation projects.

Finally, public officials need to resist the tendency, demonstrated often in recent years, to transfer funds from the capital budget to the operating budget when revenue shortfalls occur. Such political expediency fails to face up to today's urgent needs and merely shifts the burden to coming generations. But time is running out for further postponement of capital spending; the bill for past neglect is now coming due.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say to those who are talking about the IDB's I said at the very outset I wish we could have done more. I wanted to do a lot more, not because I care about helping banks or 280 or 280,000 wealthy people in the country but because over the last year or so we have absolutely decimated in this country the Federal financial support for the infrastructure needs of the cities and States. We cut out $205 billion in UDAG, half the money for UDA, mass transit is down $1.2 billion, the highway system $440 million, sewer construction is cut off $1.2 billion.

I do not see any way our cities and States are going to get the revenues in order to meet their capital improvement needs.

So I would have done more. But we are living in this Chamber in the world of doable, what we can do. So this amendment is designed to achieve what we can do.

As the distinguished Senator from Louisiana pointed out, the chairman of the Finance Committee has a 100-percent batting record, and I did not want to see us leave here without anything. So this amendment was designed to do what we could achieve some bipartisan support on. That was the reason for the amendment.

Those who want to offer another amendment to do something with the IDB's, I hope they may have the opportunity. But that is what has happened to this particular proposal.

I thank the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, let me just make clear to Senators that the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Connecticut have both been trying to prevent the States and localities from being taxed by taxing interest on their bonds. As far as we are concerned, we would be pleased to see the industrial development bond interest left out of the minimum tax on individuals as well as left out of the corporate minimum tax.

Mr. President, it is important to us that we not levy a tax on the State government itself, and when you tax the borrowing of the State, which is an essential function of government, you are taxing the State government.

That is how I look at it. In working to do what we could to try to protect the constitutional principle that we should not tax a State government on its essential function, we worked out the best compromise we could get. The Treasury and the chairman of the committee were willing to go along with us in saying that we would not apply the minimum tax for individuals to the interest on general obligations of States and localities. The individual minimum tax is the one that is a direct tax on the interest itself in the committee bill. We agreed not to apply that individual minimum tax to the interest on State general obligation and revenue bonds.

Mr. President, as far as the industrial development bonds are concerned, as many people know, the State does not pledge its full credit. The people who are at risk are the people who build these plants and other projects, and I do not believe they are protected by the Constitution, Mr. President.

It seems to me that whatever Congress wants to do by statute it will do. But those who want to do something about industrial development bonds, I would urge them to work out the best deal they can or offer the best amendment they can, and muster the most support they can, and I would be pleased to support their amendment if they can come up with a good amendment.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana says again if the Senate does not agree to this amendment there is not going to be any relief for the States and municipalities at all. I fail to see how anyone who helps to vote down an amendment which would keep us from taxing the State itself hopes to get an amendment agreed to where the State is less directly involved. This is the case when some corporation comes in and gets the Senate to go along with them for issuing industrial development bonds where the State does not pledge its credit.

I hope we will vote to give at least this much relief to the State and local governments in raising money for their essential functions.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I support this amendment. But I think, however, the debate has gotten way off point. With or without this amendment anybody will be able to buy an industrial revenue bond or a general obligation bond tax free. Anybody will be able to do it.

The fact of the matter is that all this amendment does is say that individuals, wealthy individuals, only wealthy individuals, will no longer be able to arrange their affairs through a whole range of tax shelters and whatever so that they pay no taxes or virtually no taxes at all.

This does not go to the question of buying the bonds. This only goes to the question of those few individuals, 280,000 out of 75 million taxpayers in this country, who are wealthy and pay no taxes because they have arranged their affairs in that way.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question? Just so I can understand what this amendment is, does this amendment take general obligations bonds out of the minimum tax?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes. The answer is, "yes."

Mr. BRADLEY. Out of the minimum tax.

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will just take 1 minute. I know we want to get this finished. No one is getting sleepy because if we put this off until next week there will be 5,000 amendments.

In 1971 in all bonds it was about $24 billion; in 1981 it went to $54 billion, and the revenue loss on industrial, the revenue loss is about $4 billion to the Treasury. But if you take a look at what has happened over those years, the school, the water and sewer, the highway and bridge bonds have all gone down, and the private purpose bonds have all gone up. It seems to me that we ought to vote on this amendment. Let us vote on this amendment. We will try to figure out something that maybe was not addressed before. But I hope we can proceed with this amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the amendment that I have cosponsored with Senators DODD, LONG, and others makes a very small change in this bill, but one that is very important to the financial operation of our cities, counties, and States.

The amendment would modify the individual minimum tax provisions in the bill by deleting from the list of new "tax preferences" interest earned on tax-exempt, general obligation bonds issued by State and local governments.

Mr. President, the minimum tax provisions contained in this bill are aimed at requiring all taxpayers with substantial economic income to pay at least some income taxes. This is an objective with which I fully agree. However, the real impact of including State, county, and municipal tax-exempt bonds in the list of preferences that are subject to the minimum tax would be either to drive up the interest rates on these bonds, or to severely reduce the quantity of bonds that could be sold. On the other hand, if the changes proposed in this bill become law, the fear of State and local government officials is that the market for these bonds will be severely damaged. On the other hand, even if State and political subdivision bonds could be sold, the burden of resulting higher interest rates would fall on the taxpayers who must pay the interest and principal on these bonds.

It is apparent, then, that the ultimate impact of this tax will be transferred from the purchasers of tax-exempt obligations to the States, counties, and cities, and eventually to all of the taxpayers within their boundaries.

At a time when many cities and counties are experiencing financial difficulties, it is incumbent that we not make matters worse for them. The inclusion of tax-exempt bonds in the list of preferences is a step in the wrong direction. It will have a substantial adverse impact on the market for tax-exempt bonds that will be felt by almost every taxpayer in the form of higher State, county, and city taxes. It is quite clear that the impact of these provisions is not going to be felt solely by the purchasers of tax-exempt bonds, but ultimately by all of the taxpayers who will pay the increased cost that these provisions will mandate.

I hope my colleagues will support this amendment for the benefit of all cities, counties, and States that depend on tax-exempt general obligation bonds for financing.

INDUSTRIAL REVENUE BONDS

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, section 223(b)(2) of the bill pertaining to "Cost Recovery for Certain Property Financed With Tax Exempt Bonds" provides that the amendments changing the recovery method will not apply with respect to facilities—

(i) the construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of which began prior to July 1, 1982, or

(ii) with respect to which a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures was entered into prior to July 1, 1982.

Is it correct to interpret this exception to still apply in a circumstance where as of July 1, 1982, the owner of a plant or property has begun construction of a facility covered by an industrial revenue bond or has a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures on such a facility but later transfers the rights, title and obligations with respect to such facility to a wholly owned domestic subsidiary?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, if the transfer is prior to the facility being put into operation.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? Do the Senators yield back their time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield back his time?

Mr. DODD. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DOLE. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am going to move in just a minute to table this amendment because there is another amendment which deals with all three that is fairer, and the way to do it is the way the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Connecticut originally intended, and the way to keep equality in all three is to either tax all three or do not tax all three. But to take just one out and make the GO bonds have a special privilege, in my opinion, is wrong. The way to do it is the way the Senator from Louisiana originally wanted to do it.

It is for that reason that I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 81, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Goldwater	Inouye	Weicker

So the motion to lay on the table UP Amendment No. 1132 was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1132) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, could I make one observation?

Mr. President, there is a number of amendments and I think nearly all of them can be disposed of very quickly if we can have the attention of Members. Would most Members like to finish this evening? To those who have differences, if they can go off and settle them we can work this out.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1133

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be in order at this time.

The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), for himself, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. ROTH, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1133.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 349, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following:

"(5) SPECIAL RULE FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION OR RENOVATION.—The amount of any applicable loan transaction used to acquire, construct, reconstruct, or substantially rehabilitate any qualified dwelling (within the meaning of section 55(e)(4)(B)) which is used or is to be used (determined at the time such applicable loan transaction is entered into) as a residence of the employee or of a member of the family of the employee (within the meaning of section 267(c)(4)) shall not be taken into account under paragraph (1), except that the aggregate amount of loans to an employee to which this paragraph applies may not exceed the greater of

"(A) $10,000, or

"(B) the lesser of $50,000 or one-half of the amount of the present value of the nonforfeitable accrued benefit of the employee. The dollar amounts under this paragraph shall be reduced by the amount described in paragraph (1)(B).

On page 349, line 3, strike out "(5)" and insert in lieu thereof "(6)".

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk an amendment to relax new restrictions on borrowing from pension plans imposed by the tax bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee.

This amendment is intended to help preserve an existing source of residential financing.

The Finance Committee bill limits lending by pension plans to employees to $10,000. This amendment liberalizes this limit. Under the amendment, the limit would be the higher of $10,000, or one-half of the employee's nonforfeitable benefit. In no case could the employee's total borrowing from the pension plan exceed $50,000. These higher limits apply only for housing loans.

Our principal purpose in offering this amendment is to preserve the right of employees to borrow funds from their pension plans to buy a house or to renovate a house. People of Oregon and around the country are facing severe difficulty in financing the purchase or renovation of a home. In Oregon, there is substantial unemployment and hardship caused by the housing slump. High Federal deficits lead to high interest rates, which in turn have caused this slump.

This amendment will help preserve one source of funds for residential and other borrowing. I believe it would be imprudent for Congress to rule out this source of financing now.

Pension lending programs are helpful to employees and fair to pension plans. As under current law, loans to employees must bear a "reasonable rate" of interest. This protects the investment income of the pension plan. It also gives the employee an interest rate which is probably below what he or she would pay through a commercial mortgage or other loan.

Under current law, and also under this amendment, pension plan borrowing must be made available to all employees on a nondiscriminatory basis. This assures that this is not a benefit limited to a few people who run the company.

I believe loans from pension plans for mortgages or home improvements are an excellent and legitimate use of pension funds. Next to a pension itself, homeownership is a vital key to retirement security for all of us.

Mr. President, I know of no objection to the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I would like to attract the attention of Senators CHAFEE and DOLE to discuss an interpretive question about the paragraph on page 321 of the committee report on the tax bill.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. I would like to clarify a paragraph on page 321 of the committee report relating to investment programs by pension plans in loans fully secured by property, which may include investment in mortgage loans to participants. As the Senator knows, such programs are not only a good investment for plans but also a great help to our depressed housing industry.

My understanding of this paragraph is as follows: Suppose that a plan with a large number of participants, such as a multiemployer plan, a plan of a State or local government, or a plan of a large corporation, invests $10 million in a program of residential mortgages. Suppose further that under this program the plan invests in loans to participants which are fully secured by the participant's house. The loan may secondarily be secured by the participant's account or benefit under the plan. My understanding is that no portion of those loans would be treated as distributions. I want to be absolutely certain of this.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct. If the loans are part of an investment program of such a plan and are fully secured by the property purchased with the loan proceeds, no portion of the loans will be deemed a distribution.

Mr. CHAFEE. I would now like to ask the honorable Senator from Oregon whether his amendment would affect the meaning of this paragraph. I want to be assured that the amendment would have no effect.

Mr. PACKWOOD. That is correct. My amendment in no way is intended to affect your understanding in this area, as confirmed by our most capable chairman.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. CHAFEE. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this is a very narrow amendment. I know of no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment as a cosponsor of it, along with Senator BENTSEN.

Mr. President, the committee recognized the need for pension plan participants to borrow from their plans; and the committee established a ceiling of $10,000 so as not to permit loans to diminish retirement savings substantially.

Workers have borrowed from their plans to buy their homes, to pay for their children's college education, and to cover medical emergencies. The $10,000 limit would restrict such loans and has the potential of reducing the incentive for retirement savings by curbing access to these funds.

Our amendment would increase that ceiling to $50,000; this higher limit would provide greater flexibility and cover more needs. Moreover, since a loan above $10,000 would be limited to one-half the worker's accrued benefits, the worker will still retain significant pension savings.

This is a good amendment and I urge its adoption.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY). All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1133) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask that it be in order to recognize the Senator from Utah to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator is recognized.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1134

(Purpose: To permit the deduction of construction period interest and taxes for certain construction projects planned on or before July 1, 1982)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1134.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Objection. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

On page 228, strike out lines 17 through 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982, with respect to construction which commences after such date.

(2) CERTAIN PLANNED CONSTRUCTION.—The amendments made by this section shall not apply with respect to construction of property which is used in a trade or business described in section 48(a)(e)(B) if—

(A) such construction is conducted pursuant to a written plan of the taxpayer which was in existence on July 1, 1982, and filed with a governmental regulatory agency, and

(B) such construction commences before January 1, 1984.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, give us one more second. We want to consult with the Senator from Ohio, and I think we can resolve this problem.

Mr. President, today I am introducing an amendment to section 209(e) of H.R. 4961 which will provide for a minor change in the effective date of section 209 of the bill in order to alleviate a hardship to corporations which are directly and materially adversely impacted by the bill's extension of section 189 of the Internal Revenue Code to corporations.

A number of corporations involved in major construction on a regular and continuing basis have had written plans in effect since prior to July 1, 1982, the date the Finance Committee announced its decision to extend section 189 to corporations. These construction projects have been planned in reliance on current law and, on that basis, substantial economic and planning commitments have been made prior to the date of the Finance Committee's actions. For example, certain State or local approvals are requested in the normal course of events for many of those projects, such as zoning approvals or variances, environmental impact reports, coastal commission approval, fire and safety approval et cetera. In a number of these cases, it will not be possible to commence construction by the end of 1982, as the bill would presently require, due to unresolved legal impediments such as lawsuits or the pending requests for various State or local government approvals.

In these limited circumstances, application of the new provisions of the bill would cause undue hardship, and in some cases possibly, cancellation of construction projects which provide a high level of employment at a time when increased employment in the construction industry is most needed. Many of these projects are slated for urban development areas.

In order to provide a transitional buffer to the major impact of the committee's change in the Code and to limit the application of my amendment to insure that it does not affect the revenue goals of this bill, I have included two restrictions to its application. First, each construction must be pursuant to a written plan in existence prior to July 1, 1982 and as to which any approval from any Federal, State, or local governmental unit is requested in writing in the normal course of events; and second, each construction must actually commence before January 1, 1984.

Mr. President, this amendment is highly important to our economy in terms of employment and urban development, and it has virtually no revenue impact as proposed. I urge its acceptance.

Mr. President, this amendment is supported by Senator GARN and Senator MATSUNAGA. They both support it strongly. I hope that it will be accepted. I understand that both sides are willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I support the amendment described by the Senator from Utah.

The committee bill requires the capitalization and 10-year amortization of construction-period interest and taxes. Corporate taxpayers may not deduct such payments under present law.

The committee's effective date upsets the financing of various projects which had already reached an advanced stage.

Our amendment would provide a more equitable transition rule for certain projects. It would permit these projects to continue under the current law, provided the taxpayer shows a degree of reliance on the current law. This reliance could be shown by the taxpayer's application for the necessary development permits. Certain other restrictions are included in the amendment to limit its revenue effect.

I urge its adoption.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send a modification to the desk which corrects a technical defect that the Senator from Ohio and I have been working on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to modify his amendment.

Mr. HATCH. We shall send it to the desk in just a moment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may set this aside temporarily with the right to bring it back when ready.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1135

(Purpose: To provide for coverage of hospice care under the medicare program)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania for an amendment.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be in order at this time.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) for himself and Mr. DOLE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. CHILES, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. ROTH, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. PERCY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. QUAYLE, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. COHEN, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. HAYAKAWA, Mr. GLENN, Mr. CANNON, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. NUNN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. FORD, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. WARNER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SCHMITT, Mr. DENTON, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. DIXON, Mr. SASSER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DODD, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. HART, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. EXON, Mr. PELL, and Mr. RANDOLPH proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1135.

At the end of subtitle A of title I add the following new section:

HOSPICE CARE

SEC. 122. (a)(1) Section 1811 of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "and home health services" and inserting in lieu thereof "home health services, and hospice care".

(2) Section 7(d)(1) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974 is amended by inserting "hospice care," after "home health services.".

(b)(1) Section 1812(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by adding after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) in lieu of certain other benefits, hospice care with respect to the individual during up to two periods of 90 days each with respect to which the individual makes an election under subsection (d)(1).".

(2) Section 1812 of such Act is further amended by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) Payment under this part may be made for hospice care provided with respect to an individual only during two periods of 90 days each during the individual's lifetime and only, with respect to each such period, if the individual makes an election under this paragraph to receive hospice care under this part by (or through) a particular hospice program instead of certain other benefits under this title.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraphs (B) and (C) and except in such exceptional and unusual circumstances as the Secretary may provide, if an individual makes such an election for a period with respect to a particular hospice program, the individual shall be deemed to have waived all rights to have payment made under this title with respect to—

"(i) hospice care provided by another hospice program (other than through arrangements with the particular hospice program) during the period, and

"(ii) services furnished during the period, other than physicians' service furnished by the individual's attending physician and other than services provided by (or under arrangements with) a hospice program, that are determined (in accordance with guidelines of the Secretary) either to be related to the treatment of the individual's condition with respect to which a diagnosis of terminal illness has been made or to be equivalent to (or duplicative of) hospice care.

"(B) After an individual makes such an election with respect to a 90-day period, the individual may revoke the election during the period, in which case—

"(i) the revocation shall act as a waiver of the right to have payment made under this part for any hospice care benefits for the remaining time in such period and (for purposes of subsection (a)(4) and subparagraph (A)) the individual shall be deemed to have been provided such benefits during such entire period, and

"(ii) the individual may at any time after the revocation execute a new election for a subsequent 90-day period, if the individual otherwise is entitled to hospice care benefits with respect to such a period.

"(c) An individual may, once in each such period, change the hospice program with respect to which the election is made and such change shall not be considered a revocation of an election under subparagraph (B).

"(D) For purposes of this title, an individual's election with respect to a hospice program shall no longer be considered to be in effect with respect that hospice program after the date of the individual's death or if earlier, the date the individual revocation or change of election with respect to that election takes effect.".

(c)(1) Section 1814(a) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (6), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (7) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by inserting after paragraph (7) the following new paragraph:

"(8) in the case of hospice care provided an individual in—

"(A)(i) the first 90-day period—

"(I) the individual's attending physician (as defined in section 1861(dd)(3)(P)), and

"(II) the medical director (or physician member of the interdisciplinary group described in section 1861(dd)(2)(B)) of the hospice program providing (or arranging for) the care, each certify, not later than 2 days after hospice care is initiated, that the individual is terminally ill (as defined in section 1861(dd)(3)(A)), or

"(ii) the second 90-day period, the medical director or physician described in clause (i)(II) recertifies at the beginning of the period that the individual is terminally ill;

"(B) a written plan for providing hospice care with respect to such individual has been established (before such care is provided by, or under arrangements made by, that hospice program) by the medical director (and the interdisciplinary group described in section 1861(ad)(2)(B)) of the hospice program, and is periodically reviewed by the individual's attending physician and by such medical director and group; and

"(C) such care is being or was provided pursuant to such plan of care.".

(2)(A) Section 1814(b) of such Act is amended by inserting "(other than a hospice program providing hospice care)" after "The amount paid to any provider of services".

(B) Section 1814 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"PAYMENT FOR HOSPICE CARE

"(i)(1) Subject to the limitation under paragraph (2) and the provisions of section 1813(a)(5), the amount paid to a hospice program with respect to hospice care for which payment may be made under this part shall be an amount equal to the costs which are reasonable and related to the cost necessary in the efficient delivery of needed hospice care, or which are based on such other tests of reasonableness as the Secretary may prescribe in regulations (including those authorized under section 1861(v)(1)(A)). The reasonable costs incurred in providing necessary nutritional and dietary counseling shall be allowable overhead cost items, but the costs incurred in providing bereavement counseling shall not be an allowable cost item. No counseling services shall be reimbursed as separate services.

"(2)(A) The amount of payment made under this part for hospice care provided by (or under arrangements made by) a hospice program located in a region (as defined by the Secretary) for an accounting year may not exceed the 'cap amount' for the region for the year (computed under subparagraph (B)) multiplied by the number of medicare beneficiaries in the hospice program in that year (determined under subparagraph (C)).

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the 'cap amount' for a region for a year is computed as follows:

"(i) The Secretary, using records of the program under this title, shall identify individuals (or a representative sample of such individuals) who died during the base period (as defined in clause (v)), with respect to whose death the primary cause of death was cancer, and who, during the 6-month period preceding death, were provided benefits under this title.

"(ii) The Secretary shall determine a national average medicare per capita expenditure amount by (I) determining (or estimating) the amount of payments made under this title with respect to services provided to individuals identified in clause (i) during the 6 months before death, and (II) dividing such amount of payments by the number of such individuals.

"(iii) The Secretary shall then compute a regional average medicare per capita expenditure amount for each region, by adjusting the national average medicare per capita expenditure amount (computed under clause (ii)) to reflect the relative difference between that region's average cost of delivering health care and the national average cost of delivering health care.

"(iv) The 'cap amount' for a region for an accounting year is 40 percent of the regional average determined under clause (iii) for that region, increased by the same percentage as the percentage increase in the medical care expenditure category of the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers (United States city average), published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, from the fourth month of the base period to the fifth month of the accounting year.

"(v) For purposes of this subparagraph, the term 'base period' means the most recent period of 12 months (ending before the date of the enactment of this subsection) for which the Secretary determines he has sufficient data to make the determinations required under clauses (i) through (iii).

"(C) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the 'number of medicare beneficiaries' in a hospice program in an accounting year is equal to the number of individuals who have made an election under subsection (d) with respect to the hospice program and have been provided hospice care by (or under arrangements made by) the hospice program under this part in the accounting year, such number reduced to reflect the proportion of hospice care that each such individual was provided in a previous or subsequent accounting year or under a plan of care established by another hospice program.".

(d)(1) Section 1861(u) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "hospice program," after "home health agency,".

(2) Section 1861(w)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "or home health agency" and by inserting in lieu thereof "home health agency, or hospice program".

(3) Section 1861 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"HOSPICE CARE; HOSPICE PROGRAM

"(dd)(1) The term 'hospice care' means the following items and services furnished to a terminally ill individual (as defined in paragraph (4)), by a hospice program under a written plan (for providing such care to such individual and immediate family) established by the medical director (and by the interdisciplinary group described in paragraph (2)(B) of the program, and periodically reviewed by the individual's attending physician and by such medical director and group—

"(A) nursing care provided by or under the supervision of a registered professional nurse,

"(B) physical, occupational, or speech therapy,

"(C) medical social services under the direction of a physician,

"(D)(i) services of a home health aide who has successfully completed a training program approved by the Secretary and (ii) homemaker services,

"(E) medical supplies (including drugs and biologicals, but only such drugs and biologicals as are reasonable and necessary for palliation and management of terminal illness) and the use of medical appliances, while under such a plan,

"(F) physicians' services, and

"(G) short-term inpatient care (including both respite care and procedures necessary for pain control and acute and chronic symptom management) in an inpatient facility meeting such conditions as the Secretary determines to be appropriate to provide such care, but such respite care may be provided only on an intermittent, nonroutine, and occasional basis and may not exceed 5 consecutive days in any case.

The care and services described in subparagraphs (A) and (D) may be provided on a 24-hour, continuous basis only during periods of crisis (meeting criteria established by the Secretary) and only as necessary to maintain the terminally ill individual at home.

"(2) The term 'hospice program' means a public agency or a private organization, or a subdivision of any such entity, which—

"(A)(i) is primarily engaged in providing the care and services described in paragraph (1) and makes such services available (as needed) on a 24-hour basis,

"(ii) provides for such care and services, and for dietary and nutritional counseling, and for bereavement counseling for families, in individuals' homes, on an outpatient basis, and on a short-term inpatient basis,

"(iii) provides the services listed in subparagraphs (A), (C), and (F) of paragraph (1) directly, and provides the remainder of the services listed in paragraph (1) directly or through arrangements with other hospice programs, and

"(iv) provides assurances satisfactory to the Secretary that the aggregate number of days of inpatient care described in paragraph (1)(G) provided in any 12-month period to individuals who have an election in effect under section 1812(d) with respect to that agency or organization does not exceed 20 percent of the aggregate number of days during that period on which such elections for such individuals are in effect;

"(B) has an interdisciplinary group of personnel which—

"(i) includes at least (I) one physician (as defined in subsection (r)(1)), (II) one registered professional nurse, (III) one social worker, and (IV) one pastoral or other counselor, employed by the agency or organization,

"(ii) provides the care and services described in paragraph (1), and

"(iii) establishes the policies governing the provision of such care and services;

"(C) maintains central clinical records on all patients;

"(D) does not discontinue the care it provides with respect to a patient because of the inability of the patient to pay for such care;

"(E)(i) utilizes volunteers in its provision of care and services in accordance with standards set by the Secretary, which standards shall ensure a continuing level of effort to utilize such volunteers, and (ii) maintains records on the use of these volunteers and the cost savings and expansion of care and services achieved through the use of these volunteers;

"(F) in the case of an agency or organization in any State in which State or applicable local law provides for the licensing of agencies or organizations of this nature, is licensed pursuant to such law;

"(G) maintains management responsibility for all hospice services furnished to an individual who has made an election under section 1812(d) to receive such services from such hospice program, regardless of the location or facility in which such services are furnished; and

"(H) meets such other requirements as the Secretary may find necessary in the interest of the health and safety of the individuals who are provided care and services by such agency or organization.

"(3)(A) An individual is considered to be 'terminally ill' if the individual has a medical prognosis that the individual's life expectancy is 6 months or less.

"(B) The term 'attending physician' means, with respect to an individual, the physician (as defined in subsection (r)(1) whom the individual identifies as having the most significant role in the determination and delivery of medical care to the individual at the time the individual is to be provided hospice care.

"(4) The term 'immediate family' means, with respect to an individual, the individual's spouse, parents, and children, and another person (not employed by a hospice program providing hospice care to the individual) who has assumed (as determined in accordance with guidelines of the Secretary) primary responsibility for assisting in the care of the individual.

"(5) A hospice program which is certified as a provider of another type, shall be deemed, for purposes of certification as a hospice program, to have met any requirements under this subsection which are also requirements for certification as such other type of provider. The Secretary shall coordinate surveys for determining certification under this title so as to provide, to the extent feasible, for simultaneous surveys of an entity which seeks to be certified as a hospice program and as a provider of another type. Any entity which is certified as a hospice program and as a provider of another type shall maintain separate cost reporting records with respect to costs incurred in providing hospice services and in providing other services under this title.".

(e) Section 1813(a) of such Act (as amendd by section 103 of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5)(A) The amount payable for hospice care shall be reduced by a coinsurance amount equal to—

"(i) the lesser of $10 per prescription, or an amount equal to 10 percent of the charge per prescription, for any drugs and biologicals provided on an outpatient basis by (or under arrangements with) the hospice program,

"(ii) the home health copayment amount for the applicable calendar year with respect to any visits, beginning with the twentieth visit in such calendar year, for home health aide services or homemaker services provided by (or under arrangements with) the hospice program, and

"(iii) 5 percent of the reasonable cost of any respite care provided by (or under arrangements with) the hospice program, but not to exceed the inpatient hospital deductible applicable for the year in which the individual's election under section 1812 (d)(1) began.

"(B) During the period of an election by an individual under section 1812 (d)(1), no copayments or deductibles other than those under subparagraph (A) shall apply with respect to services furnished to such individual which constitute hospice care, regardless of the setting in which such services are furnished.".

(f) Section 1862(a) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by inserting ", or, in the case of hospice care, which are not reasonable and necessary for the palliation or management of terminal illness" before the semicolon at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) by inserting "(except, in the case of hospice care, as is otherwise permitted under paragraph (1))" in paragraph (6) after "comfort items"; and

(3) by inserting "(except, in the case of hospice care, as is otherwise permitted under paragraph (1))" in paragraph (9) after "custodial care".

(g)(1) Section 1863 of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "and (cc)(2)(I)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(cc)(2)(I), and (dd)(2)".

(2) Section 1864(a) of such Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "or whether an agency is a hospice program" in the first sentence after "home health agency,"; and

(B) by striking out "or home health agency" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "home health agency, or hospice program".

(3) Section 1865(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "or (o)" in the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "(o), or (dd)".

(4) Section 1866(b)(4)(A) of such Act is amended by inserting "or hospice care" after "home health services".

(h) The amendments made by this section shall apply to hospice care provided on or after January 1, 1984, and prior to September 20, 1986.

(i) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall continue all demonstration programs in effect on the date of the enactment of this act relating to hospice care until December 31, 1983. Prior to December 31, 1983, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress a report on the effectiveness of such demonstration programs, including an evaluation of the cost-effectiveness of hospice care, the reasonableness of the 40 percent cap amount for hospice care as provided in section 1814(i) of the Social Security Act (as added by this section), proposed methodology for determining such cap amount, proposed standards for requiring and measuring the maintenance of effort for utilizing volunteers as required under section 1871(dd) of such Act, an evaluation of physician reimbursement for services furnished as a part of hospice care and for services furnished to individuals receiving hospice care but which are not reimbursed as a part of the hospice care, and any proposed legislative changes in the hospice care provisions of title XVIII of such Act.

(j)(1) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct a study and, prior to January 1, 1986, report to the Congress on whether or not the reimbursement methodology and the benefit structure for hospice care under title XVIII of the Social Security Act are fair and equitable and promote the most efficient provision of hospice care. Such report shall include the feasibility and advisability of providing for prospective reimbursement for hospice care, an evaluation of the inclusion of payment for outpatient drugs, an evaluation of the impact of expanding hospice care reimbursement to include nutritional, dietary, and bereavement counseling as hospice care, and any recommendations for legislative changes in the hospice care reimbursement or benefit structure.

(2) The Comptroller General shall monitor and evaluate the study and the preparation of the report under paragraph (1).

(k) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall grant waivers of the limitations imposed by section 1814(i)(2) of the Social Security Act (relating to the cap amount), section 1861(dd)(1)(G) of such Act (relating to the limitations on the frequency and number of respite care days), and section 1861(dd)(2)(A)(iv) of such Act (relating to the aggregate limit on the number of days of inpatient care), as may be necessary to allow any institution which commenced operations as a hospice prior to January 1, 1975, to participate in a viable manner as a hospice program under title XVIII of the Social Security Act.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, my amendment represents a unique opportunity to include as part of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act a provision that will improve benefits for medicare beneficiaries while saving money for the social security trust funds.

That amendment, which I am offering today, along with Senators DOLE, PACKWOOD, DURENBERGER, CHILES, CHAFEE, ANDREWS, COHEN, KASSEBAUM, ROTH, GLENN, PRYOR, BENTSEN, DANFORTH, PERCY, BURDICK, QUAYLE, STAFFORD, CANNON, HAWKINS, GRASSLEY, TSONGAS, HAYAKAWA, HATCH, and many others for a total of 68 cosponsors will expand medicare to cover hospice services. Hospice, as many of my colleagues know, is a method caring for the terminally ill. Hospice care is designed to help the terminally ill continue their lives with as little disruption as possible. Therefore, it emphasizes supportive services such as home care and pain control, rather than cure-oriented institutional treatment.

Mr. President, when one talks about the terminally ill, one thinks of people in the last several months of their lives. Yet the term, "hospice," really is a concept that is designed to alleviate much of the distress attendant upon both the patient and the family. The hospice concept emphasizes palliative care—it emphasizes the alleviation of the psychological, spiritual, and emotional stress that people are under when confronted with a terminal illness. And therefore, "hospice" really means living and living in dignity.

Mr. President, this amendment is based upon legislation introduced in this session by the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, and Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. LONG, myself, and others, and is now cosponsored by more than 50 Members of the Senate. This amendment does, however differ in several significant respects from the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, including the following.

My amendment provides for two benefit periods of 90 days each for each beneficiary. The implementation date of this provision is December 31, 1983, which will allow ample time to fully evaluate the current hospice demonstrations. Reimbursement is based on reasonable costs, with a limit set at 40 percent of the average medicare per capita expenditure during the last 6 months of a beneficiary's life reflecting regional differences. We have also included in the amendment measures to guard against excessive utilization while maintaining the integrity of the hospice benefit.

Mr. President, I want to point out that this amendment, if it is adopted, will permit humane treatment of the terminally ill outside of hospitals, for the most part—$300-a-day hospitals—and will permit their care and treatment in noninstitution, typically home settings.

The amendment saves money. CBO has completed a cost estimate as follows: zero cost the first year, a savings of $11 million the second year, and a savings of $22 million the third year—for the very simple reason that this offers an alternative to the present, very costly mix of traditional medicare services for the dying.

Mr. President, at present, 50 percent of patients currently in hospice programs are medicare beneficiaries, but medicare does not pay for many essential hospice services. As a result, the system encourages hospice providers to bill for more costly services at acute care rates to protect the patients.

As chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I recently held a hearing on the issue of medicare coverage for hospice services. Families of hospice patients told me that the services enabled them to keep their dying family members at home as long as possible; that it provided support needed to cope with the terminal illness—support not received in other settings; and that hospice was more humane and less expensive than traditional care.

Mr. President, over 300,000 medicare beneficiaries, expected to die of cancer during 1983, are currently denied access to hospice care.

Expenditures for medicare enrollees in their last 40 days of life—which is the typical length of stay for hospice care—in 1981 accounted for $4 billion, most of which was for hospital care.

Technological advances in modern medicine have helped to prolong life. In many ways, this has led to a system of health care which focuses almost exclusively on curing illness through hospital based medical care.

Frequently, the special needs of those for whom there is no cure is neglected, or at best, relegated to secondary considerations.

Hospice care represents an alternative method of caring for the terminally ill with a special emphasis on maintaining the quality of the last days of life. This amendment will insure that medicare beneficiaries will not be denied access to this frequently preferable mode of care—an assurance that is long overdue.

It is my understanding that the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee is prepared to accept this amendment. I thank him and his very capable staff for their assistance on this important amendment.

Mr. GLENN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEINZ. I am happy to yield to Senator GLENN, who is a cosponsor.

Mr. GLENN. May I have 2 minutes?

Mr. HEINZ. I do not know how much time I have on this.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator HEINZ as a sponsor of this amendment which would provide medicare coverage for hospice services, with an emphasis on those services which are provided in the home. Previously, I cosponsored S. 1958 which would allow medicare-eligible Americans an opportunity to choose between either hospice or traditional treatment for terminal illnesses.

I believe that we should support the right of terminally ill patients to receive the type care they desire. Also, by substituting hospice care for the regular medicare hospital benefit, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that this would mean a medicare savings of $16 to $17 million over a 3-year period, 1983-85.

I ask the Senator, he had some figures that are different from the ones I had on savings. It is nice we can stand on the floor of the Senate and argue about which of us has the biggest saving proposed in a particular piece of legislation. The figures I have is that this would save $16 to $17 million over a 3-year period. I believe the Senator's figures were larger than that. In any event, if it is a saving and better care, I am for it.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I urge Senate adoption of the Heinz-Dole-Packwood amendment to provide hospice services to terminally ill medicare patients.

For those of my colleagues who might not be familiar with the term hospice, it refers to physical and emotional support in allowing a terminally ill patient to die with dignity and, in most cases, in his or her own home.

As one Senator who has long advocated a strong home care program for senior citizens, this amendment furthers that goal. It provides a series of services offering the terminally ill medicare patient the choice to pass away in his home. More importantly, this amendment, as estimated by the Congressional Budget Office, will "save" the Government money. Let me repeat this—CBO estimates the amendment will save the Federal Government money. It will do so because it will allow the individual to spend his last days at home or in a hospice facility—and not in a hospital.

Specifically, this proposal would provide:

1. Up to 180 days of hospice coverage;

2. Outpatient drug coverage for pain relieving drugs;

3. Nursing services, therapy, home health aide coverage, respite care, physician services, and short-term inpatient hospitalization.

Mr. President, the Heinz-Dole-Packwood amendment is an important step toward helping seniors. It saves the Federal Government millions of dollars, and it places a very important new program into medicare—a program to allow people to die in their own homes in a humane way—and not in a hospital.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Oregon for that fine statement.

HOSPICE CARE

Mr. President, 4 years ago, this Senator made a statement on the Senate floor extolling the virtues of alternative methods of care for the terminally ill. I indicated at that time that most American hospitals were designed to give acute, highly technical and aggressive care, designed to prolong life. While this design is generally a good one, the needs and problems of the terminally ill are unlike those handled best in this atmosphere.

I believed in 1978, and continue to believe today, that we must examine how we can best meet the needs of the terminally ill. In discussions with individuals who are terminally ill and in conversations with their families we hear many unmet needs verbalized time and time again. These needs revolve around self-control, decisionmaking, relief of pain, rights of privacy and the right of the patient to know the truth about their prognosis.

The legislation embodied in the amendment being offered today is an outgrowth of our early efforts to determine how best to assist individuals who are terminally ill.

Hospice care is increasingly recognized as an alternative way of caring for the terminally ill. It is a mode of care that emphaizes palliative care—medical relief of pain—rather than curative care and is designed to address the physical, psychological, and spiritual needs of the patient and the emotional needs of the family. Hospice care is typically regarded as more humane and less expensive than conventional hospital care and treatment for the terminally ill.

THE HOSPICE CONCEPT

The term hospice has come to mean physical and emotional support and dignity to thousands upon thousands of individuals around the world.

The concept of hospice care carries with it the thought of living, not of death and dying. This model of care and treatment is long overdue in the United States.

The hospice approach to care for the dying is a program of active medical attention whose chief characteristics are the sophisticated management of severe pain and optimum use of home care. Hospice care may be available through home care, outpatient services, or an inpatient program. Care is provided by a multidisciplinary team made up of nurses, physicians, and other providers. Psychological, spiritual, and sociological needs are regarded as important to care as the treatment of physical complaints.

The hospice movement has grown dramatically within the last few years. In 1979, the General Accounting Office reported 59 operating hospices. Today, there is a hospice movement in every State with estimates of operating hospices ranging from 600 to 700, with several hundred others in the planning stage.

PREVIOUS ACTION

In 1978, at the urging of this Senator and others, a hospice task force was formed within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to examine the hospice movement in the United States, and the appropriate role the Federal Government might play in hospice care. One of the outgrowths of these early actions was the announcement by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, of their intention to conduct demonstration projects with organizations providing hospice services. The demonstration projects permitted the waiver of certain statutory and regulatory requirements to allow coverage of hospice services provided to medicare beneficiaries and medicaid recipients.

The demonstration, which actually began on October 1, 1980, consists of a 24-month experimental phase during which hospice services will be reimbursed. Twenty-six sites were selected for participation in this HCFA demonstration program. We understand that the earliest preliminary results of these studies will be available in late 1982.

Other activities in the hospice area have also been helpful to us in developing this legislation. The Warner-Lambert Foundation recently commissioned an independent costs analysis on the fiscal impact of caring for the terminally ill in the current medicare system as opposed to a medicare system which included the hospice alternative.

The National Cancer Institute also conducted a 3-year demonstration program on the costs of hospice care.

Blue Cross plans in several States have studied the comparative costs of caring for the terminally ill in the traditional system against the costs in a hospice. Other private insurance companies have also conducted analysis prior to adding the hospice benefit to group health policies.

The Congressional Budget Office has looked into hospice programs as part of its effort to estimate the costs for the hospice legislation—S. 1958—I introduced in December 1981 along with many of my colleagues. CBO found that while the addition of hospice benefits to medicare might result in a small cost increase in the first 2 years after implementation, for subsequent years increased utilization of the hospice option in lieu of more conventional hospital treatment for the terminally ill would result in long-term program savings. CBO estimated that for the hospice proposal—H.R. 5180 as revised by the House Ways and Means Committee—$16.5 million could be saved by the medicare program in 1985.

All the information gathered thus far from these projects and evaluations have been helpful in drafting the amendment on behalf of hospice care offered here today.

PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT

In general, the amendment would permit medicare beneficiaries who are expected to die within 6 months to elect to receive a full range of hospice services. The kinds of services covered include those now covered as home health services plus physicians' services, short-term institutional care, respite services—to periodically relieve family members of the burden of caring for the patient—homemaker services, and outpatient prescription drugs.

A beneficiary could elect to receive hospice benefits for no more than two periods, each lasting no more than 90 days each. In electing hospice benefits, the beneficiary would waive entitlement to all the nonhospice benefits available under medicare except for benefits for his attending physician, who might, in some cases, wish to continue caring for the patient in conjunction with the hospice physician.

A hospice would be reimbursed under part A of medicare for its covered costs subject to a ceiling which attempts to insure that the hospice payments would not exceed the amount that would have been spent by medicare had the patient been treated in a traditional setting.

The amendment offered today is a modification of the bill—S. 1958—which the Senator from Kansas introduced in December 1981. It has been modified in ways intended to keep costs for the proposal within an acceptable range. As I mentioned earlier, CBO has estimated a long range cost savings to medicare if a hospice proposal of this type is enacted. But admittedly CBO also found a short-term cost increase attached to the bill as originally introduced in December. Consequently, we have been looking at ways to get those initial costs down. Some of the changes we have incorporated have also been approved by the House Ways and Means Committee in its budget recommendations.

One of the most important modifications is the inclusion of nominal cost-sharing amounts on certain covered services, namely outpatient drugs, home health services, and respite care. The importance of cost sharing as a mechanism to control program costs cannot be underrated. Imposition of cost sharing on a new benefit such as outpatient drugs provided through a hospice program is essential to keep costs for this expanded benefit at an acceptable level. CBO cost estimates for the hospice proposal have previously indicated that a large part of any additional cost for a hospice benefit would be due to the coverage of outpatient drugs. Therefore, we are recommending that outpatient drugs provided under a hospice program be subject to a cost-sharing amount of 10 percent per prescription or $10 per prescription, whichever is less.

In addition, our amendment would make home health services under a hospice program subject to the same coinsurance we have proposed be applicable to other home health benefits covered under medicare; that is, a 5-percent coinsurance starting with the 20th visit. It would seem fair that medicare beneficiaries opting for a hospice program not be exempted from the cost-sharing amounts we are recommending be imposed on beneficiaries using nonhospice home health benefits. Respite care, wherever provided, would also be subject to a 5-percent copayment for each day of care. However, the total amount the patient would be liable to pay could not exceed the amount of the annual inpatient hospital deductible.

CONCERNS REGARDING COST

As indicated earlier, we have received CBO cost estimates indicating that implementation of a hospice proposal along the lines we have outlined today will ultimately result in a long-term savings to the medicare program. Such estimates, however, have necessarily been based on the rather limited data available at present costs of hospice programs compared to conventional treatment costs.

We feel that the findings from the HCFA demonstrations will greatly enhance our ability to make projections about the cost-effectiveness of hospice care and the wisdom of covering such services under medicare. Accordingly, we are requesting that the Secretary's report examine such issues as: The cost-effectiveness of the hospice benefit; the appropriateness of the cost-sharing amounts imposed on benefits; the method for determining the 40-percent cap on reimbursement to hospice programs; ways to assure a so-called maintenance of effort with regard to use of volunteers under hospice programs; and other issues related to the satisfactory implementation of the hospice benefit.

We would further like to emphasize our desire that the report address the adequacy of the reimbursement methodology to be applied to hospice care programs. Questions have been raised over the ability of the Department, based on existing data, to accurately predict the average level of medicare expenditures in a given region for terminally ill patients in the last 6 months of life. Therefore, we feel it is essential that the Secretary, in his report to Congress, document the Department's ability to make such calculations and to administer the 40-percent hospice reimbursement cap. We would expect the report to include any recommendations for legislation needed to assure that the hospice benefit does not result in long-range cost increases in the medicare program.

In keeping with our amendment requiring a pre-implementation report on the HCFA hospice demonstrations, we are establishing December 31, 1983, as the effective date of the benefit. This would allow the Department of HHS to evaluate the findings of the HCFA demonstrations and to incorporate recomendations based on these findings in the pre-implementation report discribed above. This time would also permit Congress to consider any legislative modifications that might be necessary as a result of the Secretary's findings.

Mr. President, I feel that we now have before us a workable vehicle with appropriate safeguards to assure the program is not abused. In this context, I would like to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post in support of the hospice benefit expansion.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 12, 1982]

MEDICARE AND THE HOSPICES

The American medical system is very well geared to care for people whose ailments or disabilities are curable or, at least, controllable. It is much less well suited to care for those whose illnesses are no longer treatable. A bill before Congress would extend to terminally ill persons covered by Medicare the possibility of seeking "hospice" care, a method of care designed to help dying people remain free of pain and in their homes for as long as possible.

In the past several years, over 400 hospice programs have been started around the country. There is no single model of hospice care, but there are several essential features of it. Hospice care is strictly limited to persons who are no longer receiving curative treatments. While inpatient care may be provided, the aim of the programs is to keep patients comfortable in their homes as long as possible, involve family members in patient care and help families to adjust both before and after the patient's death. Volunteers are used extensively, although doctors and other professionals are on-call around the clock for home visits.

The most important advantage of hospice care is that many patients and families find it a humane and comforting alternative to the high-technology medicine offered by regular hospitals. However, because of its emphasis on in-home care and the use of volunteers, hospice care can be far less expensive than hospital care or nursing home care, the normal alternatives for the terminally ill. The excellent Hospice of Northern Virginia, for example, has found that its cost of providing in-home care is about $68 a day compared with an average cost of $503 a day for final admissions to local hospitals. Even when patients must be moved to the hospice facility, the daily cost is only $270.

Because a very large proportion of Medicare costs are spent on patients in the last year of life, hospice care promises substantial savings for the program. The Health and Human Services Department, however, is concerned that if hospice care coverage is not properly circumscribed, it could be exploited by proprietary firms set up to take advantage of the new authority, and end up costing more than it saves. HHS would prefer to wait for action until the results of a demonstration project have been analyzed. Congress is also being barraged by other types of health-care providers—everything from skilled nursing homes to music therapists—who think they should be covered, too.

The history of government health programs would cetainly sugggest caution in any extension of coverage. But more than two years are likely to elapse before HHS has completed its study—the results of which are unlikely to be conclusive. In the meantime, hospices currently covered by Medicare as part of the study may have to close down when the project ends next fall, and many other patients will be denied access to a form of care that has shown itself to be humane and efficient. Safeguards are needed to make sure that hospice coverage is not abused, but strickly limited coverage is better than no coverage at all. The bill should be passed.

Mr. DOLE. Our experience with the medicaid mills and other unscrupulous health care operations has taught us that we must move with utmost caution in the development of a hospice benefit. But move we must—the growth of the hospice movement is a long-range goal—an effort to ameliorate some of the existing conditions for the terminally ill in hospitals is something that must begin today. We must also push our health manpower education system to more fully prepare health professionals to deal with the problems of the terminally ill and of their families.

We must all work together to provide for those in our society who are near death, an environment that recognizes them as individuals: individuals with dignity seeking only to spend their last days and hours peacefully in a manner of their choosing.

Mr. President, I support the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. It is about a 30-month provision, and it does save about $33 million.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of S. 1958—the hospice bill—I am pleased to join Senator HEINZ in cosponsoring the pending amendment to permit hospice care for the terminally ill to be reimbursed under medicare.

The hospice approach to caring for the dying involves the use of a multidisciplinary team including physicians, nurses, and other health and support service professionals. Physical, psychological, and spiritual needs are considered important in providing care to the patient. My own State of Texas now has 19 hospices, most of which offer a full range of services including treatment at home and greater family involvement in the care of individual patients. I would like to emphasize for those who may question the advisability of expanding the number of reimbursible services, that this amendment will not increase the costs of the medicare program. Those eligible for hospice benefits would already be entitled to medicare reimbursement for hospital, nursing home, or home health care. By choosing hospice services, other medicare benefits are waived, though if the patient prefers to return to full hospital care he is permitted to do so.

Mr. President, I firmly believe we should begin in earnest to explore alternative approaches to the delivery of health care—both to better control costs and to encourage greater participation by the family. This amendment, which is projected to save at least $33 million over the next 3 years is a timely and necessary step in that direction. In addition, the quality of care for the terminal patient—too often characterized by the sterile environment of an institution—will be markedly improved by providing individuals the option to spend their last weeks at home or in a home-like setting with family members at their side. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of the pending amendment.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague on the Senate Special Committee on Aging, Senator HEINZ, in cosponsoring the amendment to extend medicare coverage for hospice care services.

Earlier this year, I joined with a number of my colleagues in support of legislation introduced by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, Senator DOLE, to expand benefits under medicare to include hospice services for the terminally ill. Our original bill, S. 1958, was an attempt to focus attention on this innovative and important alternative to institutional health care in long-term care facilities. Since that time, over half the Senate has joined in cosponsoring the bill, and support has grown substantially for the House companion bill.

I have learned from firsthand visits to hospice facilities in my own State that hospices offer a special system of support and caring for terminal patients and their families. As a member of the Aging Committee, I hope later this fall to conduct a hearing on the concept of hospice care.

Experts estimate that even though over 300,000 terminally ill patients may be eligible for hospice care by the year 2000, only from 10 to 40 percent will use it. However, one analysis shows that the number of patients likely to use hospice services would increase five times if hospice costs were covered.

The amendment being offered today represents an important first step in this direction. It would provide for medicare coverage for hospice service for two benefit periods of 90 days each. It would reduce the reimbursement cap included in S. 1958 from 75 to 40 percent of the average per capita cost of health expenditures for a medicare beneficiary suffering from a terminal illness.

The amendment also adds a 10 percent copayment on outpatient drugs (per prescription) or a $10 maximum per prescription, whichever is met first.

And, it would stipulate that the copayment on home health care should conform to the home health copayment requirement in the medicare statute as agreed to by the Senate earlier, requiring a 5-percent copayment after the 19th visit.

In addition, the amendment would require the Secretary of Health and Human Services to continue the 26 ongoing hospice demonstrations until implementation of this provision. The Secretary is required to report to the Congress on the demonstration projects prior to implementation of the legislation, specifically on the cost effectiveness of the hospice benefit, the reasonableness of the 40-percent cap, the retention of volunteer services, evaluation of physician service reimbursement for physicians within or outside the hospice benefit, and any other recommendations for legislative changes based on demonstration findings. Finally the amendment includes a sunset provision to the bill to go into effect on September 30, 1986.

It is important to note that this amendment only addresses one part of hospice care. It seeks only to alter the reimbursement system, not the volunteer effort which is the heart of the hospice care. In Maine, 20 such volunteer groups have coalesced to form a statewide network organization to broaden community involvement and awareness of hospice care. Their participation is crucial, and I am confident that this amendment will encourage their efforts by giving medicare patients the option of hospice care.

There can be many settings for hospice care, ranging from semi-institutionalized care to home-based health care. Volunteers help in this effort in support of families where a member has a terminal illness. Their compassionate and humane care is the central part of any hospice program. I hope that congressional efforts in this area will increase their ability to serve as many patients as possible.

I commend my colleagues for the work they have done in drafting this amendment, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, Americans deserve a better way of death. John Wayne was regarded as one of our great American heros. He was destined to die an American death—one filled with pain and suffering.

Racked with pain as the result of the terminal stages of cancer, John Wayne was presented with two choices by his doctors. He could be pain free, but unconscious for most of the time as the result of the high doses of pain medication. The other choice was that he remain unmedicated, awake and alert, but in great pain and discomfort. Because he wanted to spend as much time as possible with his family, John Wayne chose the latter.

Regrettably, this scene is replayed over and over again every day in every hospital in this country. But it doesn't have to be. We now have a third alternative for the terminally ill patient.

The dying patient who does not want heroic, life-sustaining measures forced on him; the dying patient who wants to be pain free and conscious to enjoy those final precious moments with his family; the family of the dying patient who wants help in going through this traumatic time—these situations can all be met with the introduction of a hospice program.

The hospice approach has been used in the United Kingdom for over 15 years. It has been gaining in popularity here in the United States ever since people discovered that it offers the terminally ill and their families a way to approach death with dignity.

Under hospice, dying patients are kept pain free but alert. They and their families are guided through the four stages of dying by teams of health professionals. Families are assisted as they help their family member through this final phase of life. Families are offered bereavement support after the patient has died—a sound investment considering that these family members often become ill themselves if they are not given the proper emotional support.

Unfortunately, the hospice movement here has not been as pervasive as it needs to be because many of these services are not covered by the medicare insurance program. An investment in hospice is one that will reap benefits—in dollars as well as in the improved quality of life for the terminally ill patient.

I strongly support the effort of my colleague (Mr. HEINZ), as he offers this amendment today.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am very pleased to be a cosponsor of this amendment.

I do not believe that the medicare system should discriminate between the types of available care in the final days of an individual's life.

This proposal recognizes the humanitarian aspects of hospice care by allowing individuals who must rely on the medicare system for their medical coverage.

Hospices provide a very humanitarian alternative means of care for the terminally ill patient. The theory upon which this type of care is based simply allows the terminally ill to choose to spend their last days in a serene, peaceful manner.

I congratulate my colleagues on their efforts in proposing this amendment.

HOSPICE CARE UNDER MEDICARE

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a sponsor of this amendment to provide medicare reimbursement for hospice services.

There should be little question about the provisions of this amendment. It has broad support.

Since I joined with Senator DOLE, Senator HEINZ, and others to introduce our hospice bill (S. 1958) last December, over 50 Senators have become cosponsors.

There is also wide support in the House where a companion bill has over 300 cosponsors, and the Ways and Means Committee has already included provisions similar to this amendment in their reconciliation bill.

Hearings have been conducted in the House. On this side, we have all received a lot of thoughtful comments on the original hospice bill. I know I have, from families who have participated in hospice programs and from many very dedicated people in my own State who have organized hospice programs and who are now serving hundreds of terminally ill patients.

The amendment we have before us now is the product of a careful and thoughtful fine tuning of our original bill.

We are all very conscious of rising health care costs and the problem they pose for the integrity of the medicare program itself. Because of this, there was some initial concern about possible additional medicare costs as a result of the hospice reimbursement proposal.

But we have now had time to make some adjustments and to develop good cost estimates. The result is that the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the net effect of our amendment over a 3-year period will be a savings to medicare of at least $16 million.

It is not always easy to find ways to strengthen and improve medicare benefits without additional cost. But in this case, we have an amendment which will make much needed improvements—and save the medicare program money at the same time.

I believe we are now ready to recognize hospice services under medicare. What our amendment would do is permit medicare beneficiaries who are terminally ill to elect to receive a full range of hospice services instead of utilizing their medicare hospital insurance benefit. Services would include physician and nursing care when needed, home health aide and physical and speech therapy, pain-killing drugs, and emotional support for a patient and bereaved family members.

Hospice services would be available primarily in a patient's home, but limited inpatient days would also be part of the benefit to provide a respite for family members and to accommodate specific short-term patient needs.

What this amendment offers is an alternative to costly, often painful, and frequently unwanted hospital care for the terminally ill patient. It offers a terminally ill medicare beneficiary the possibility of a supportive and caring environment.

For many years, the plight of the terminally ill patient was a story of despair. Too often, they had no say in a choice of treatment, or in where they would spend their last days. Sometimes they weren't even told of how serious their conditions were, or even of the chances of their recovery. There was often little choice but to stay hooked up to machines, living the final days of life confined to a hospital bed, with restricted visiting hours, noisy corridors, and tubes and machines.

But times have changed. We have seen the development of hospice programs. In a hospice program, a dying patient and his family can be together, in their own home. The patient can be comfortable, in familiar surroundings. The patient and his family can help develop a plan of care, and the patient can continue a relaxed, developing relationship with his family.

Hospice programs have brought out the best in our communities. The backbone of the hospice movement has been the involvement of volunteers. Volunteers began hospice programs. They have been the people who provide counseling and emotional support for families. They have often been professional medical personnel who contribute their services to a hospice program.

The bill we originally introduced recognized the importance of continuing this involvement of community volunteers by requiring that any hospice program certified for medicare reimbursement include a strong volunteer component. The amendment we are offering today includes this requirement, and further strengthens it.

Bereavement counseling for family members, which is so important in any hospice program, would be a required hospice component. But at the same time our amendment would not set a new precedent for medicare reimbursement for counseling services for family members, who are not medicare beneficiaries. I think this is a wise adjustment to our original bill. It will help insure that hospice programs which qualify for medicare reimbursement for the medical and home care services provided to patients will remain fully supported by community volunteers.

Mr. President, we have a number of well-developed hospice programs in Florida. The State has a licensing program for hospices, one that has matured and been adjusted based on experience. A lot of the lessons we have learned are reflected in this amendment.

We have included reimbursement ceilings which help to emphasize the more flexible and less costly home care component of hospice programs. Qualifying hospice programs would be encouraged to make full use of existing community health services such as home health agencies and hospitals and nursing homes, rather than establishing additional services. A hospice patient's own physician would be fully involved in the care provided. The benefit period has been altered to more accurately reflect the average length of stay in a hospice program now. Our original bill had provided for two 180-day benefit periods. This amendment limits the total hospice benefit period to 180 days, divided into two separate 90-day periods. The average length of stay in a hospice program now is between 40 and 50 days. Many patients do, of course, require a longer stay than the average and this benefit period will provide enough flexibility to insure that once a patient enters a hospice program he will not be forced to leave.

I urge all my colleagues to support this amendment.●

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. President, hospice care is a humane, compassionate alternative to traditional health care for terminally ill patients. In our rush to extend life, I am afraid that we have tended to overlook people's need to confront death. Hospice care offers not only medical care, but emotional and spiritual counseling for terminally ill patients. Hospice care is a long overdue effort to be sensitive to the needs of a group of people we have been tempted to ignore as a society, either because of our fear of our own mortality, or because our efforts have been concentrated on extending life.

Mr. President, if we are truly concerned at all aspects of the quality of health care in the United States, we ought to bring hospice care into our health care delivery system.●

HOSPICE PROGRAMS

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the hospice legislation now before us refects the creativity and adaptability of the American people. The hospice movement began in the United States less than 10 years ago. It has spread rapidly through the country as a compassionate and cost effective form of providing care to terminally ill patients. In different parts of the country, hospices took on different forms—free standing, profit and nonprofit, hospital or nursing home-based. In order to benefit from this rich experience HHS Secretary Joseph Califano, at President Carter's direction, held a national Hospice Conference and began a study of the costs and experiences of the different types of hospices in the country. The demonstrations are just now coming to an end and the analysis will take an additional 1 to 2 years.

Based on the early findings of this and other smaller studies, hospices will save money. These preliminary findings have allowed the Congressional Budget Office to assure us that the cost of care for patients in community based hospices will be less than that of care for comparable patients treated conventionally. There is no question but that hospice care is desirable. Many of the concepts of hospice care are similar to those in my social security title XXI long-term care bill. These concepts, encourage home care for patients, through a financially flexible and administratively responsible patient care assessment team which allows patients to be cared for in their home rather than in institutions.

At the same time, there are many unanswered questions about long-term care and about hospice care. The legislation before us does not have the full benefit of the results of the national demonstration program or of complete congressional deliberation. As a result there are several provisions that give me concern. The bill, nevertheless, should be passed so that we can begin to benefit from what is clearly a superior way of caring for the dying.

I am concerned however that we might be preventing all who need hospice care from receiving it. We also may be limiting the types of hospice care that will be available without knowing if this is desirable. By imposing copayments on dying patients who have already paid hospital and part B deductibles and who have had large and continuing health care costs for medicines and doctors, we may discourage people who would like to use hospices from being able to afford hospice care. Discouraging the use of hospices is not in the national interest because these patients will remain in hospitals at a much higher cost to government.

This bill may also destroy hospital or nursing home-based hospices. These hospices may be caring for a sicker group of hospice patients. Nearly all their patients come directly from acute hospital beds to these less expensive and more appropriate hospice beds before returning to their homes. Some of these very ill terminal patients spend little time at home before dying.

The average patient cost for those units may well exceed the levels of cost acceptable under this bill. Such hospice will not therefore be eligible for medicare payment and may have to close. The last days of those who are able to use hospice care are spent in greater comfort and security. This comfort and peace of mind are appreciated by both the patients and their families.

I hope that with the passage of the hospice bill we do not preclude the full opportunity to benefit from the hospice concept. I will work to improve and broaden hospice care until it is available to all who need it no matter how sick they may be. For today, this is a promising start.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all my time on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

Mr. HEINZ. I yield back my time.

Mr. LONG. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment (UP No. 1135) was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1134

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, now we return to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a modification is at the desk. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment (UP No. 1134), as modified, is as follows:

On page 228, strike out lines 17 through 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982, with respect to construction which commences after such date.

(2) CERTAIN PLANNED CONSTRUCTION.—The amendments made by this section shall not apply with respect to construction of property which is used in a trade or business described in section 48(a)(3)(B) if—

(A) such construction is conducted pursuant to a written plan of the taxpayer which was in existence on July 1, 1982 and as to which approval from a governmental unit has been requested in writing, and

(B) such construction commences before January 1, 1984.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I believe that both sides accept the amendment as so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back my time.

Let me say that this amendment has been discussed with Treasury. It has been cleared on both sides. It has Democratic and Republican sponsors, and I am prepared to yield back the time.

Mr. HATCH. I move the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The amendment (UP No. 1134) as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1136

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), for himself, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HOLLINGS, and Mr. DENTON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1136.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

That Section 292 of H.R. 4961 is amended—

(1) by striking out at the end of subparagraph (ii) (II) the year "1965" and substituting therefore the year "1966".

(2) by striking out at the end of subparagraph (ii)(III) the year "1938" and substituting therefor the year "1953".

(3) by striking out subsection (iii)(III) and substituting therefor.

"(III) the term 'chain of newspaper publications' means four or more newspaper publications which—

"(aa) are not published in a single city, community, or metropolitan area, or after December 31, 1978, within one State,

"(bb) are controlled, directly or indirectly, by the same person or persons, and

"(cc) on the date of enactment did not have a combined average daily circulation in excess of 600,000."

(4) by adding at the end thereof as subsection (IV) the following:

"(IV) For purposes of Clause (III) a morning and evening, or week-end or Sunday newspaper or combination thereof, published in a single city, community, or metropolitan area, by or under the direction of substantially the same principal publisher, shall be counted as only one newspaper publication."

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, under this proposed amendment to section 292(ii) of H.R. 4961 as reported by the Senate Finance Committee, Public Welfare Foundation of Washington, D.C. will not be required to divest itself of the interests which it held on March 26, 1969, in several small, independent newspapers—the Spartansburg Herald and Journal, Inc., the Gadsden Times, Inc., and the Tuscaloosa News, Inc.—in order to avoid the excise taxes under section 4943 on excess business holdings. This exemption from section 4943 divestiture requirements would not apply to any interests which may be held by Public Welfare Foundation in any other business enterprise.

I might say that Senator HOLLINGS joins me on this amendment, Senator HEFLIN of Alabama joins on this amendment, and Senator DENTON of Alabama joins on this amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be pleased to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is this the specific amendment that the Senator and I discussed earlier?

Mr. THURMOND. It is the specific amendment that the Senator looked over and had no objection to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. It is estimated that this provision will have no effect on budget receipts since absent the requested legislation divestiture will be required.

Public Welfare Foundation was formed as a tax exempt charitable corporation in 1952 under the laws of the State of Delaware. It is so recognized by the Internal Revenue Service. Since its organization, through October 31, 1981, it has made grants for recognized charitable purposes which aggregate in excess of $23,500,000. In its fiscal year ended October 31, 1981, Public Welfare Foundation made charitable grants totaling $3,963,000 and in the current year it is making grants at the annual rate of approximately $5 million. These charitable grants have been made possible through Public Welfare Foundation's ownership of three locally published newspapers, that is, the Spartanburg Herald and Journal, the Gadsden Times, and the Tuscaloosa News. Each of these newspapers, since 1966, has been owned by the Foundation in a separate, fully taxable, wholly owned, subsidiary corporation. Prior to the formation of these subsidiaries, the newspapers were owned directly by the Foundation. Each such subsidiary is operated by local persons. All editorial control is exercised at the local level by those employees.

Under present law Public Welfare Foundation would be required to divest itself by 1989 of at least 50 percent of its ownership in each of said corporations. However, under existing economic conditions, if Public Welfare Foundation were to be able to maintain its present level of charitable grants ($5 million), pay the 2 percent excise tax imposed on private foundations, and pay its reasonable administration costs (presently less than $325,000), Public Welfare Foundation would have to realize such a substantial sum from the sale of its newspaper interests that it is not unreasonable to anticipate that, for a purchaser to be of sufficient size to be able to finance such an acquisition of Public Welfare Foundation's interests, it probably would be one of the very large newspaper chains. Thus, further concentration of the ownership of local newspapers by large chains would be a likely result. And, if the Foundation, under section 4943(c)(4), were, during the next 15-year transitional period to retain the permissible 49 percent interests before it was required to further reduce its holdings, it would be placed in the disadvantageous position of being a minority shareholder, under the domination of the majority shareholder, possibly a large chain, with a resulting limited market and a depressed price for any subsequent sale of its minority interests.

Accordingly, these amendments would permit the Foundation to continue to own the local newspapers, and make it possible for the present local publishers, editors, and other employees to publish these newspapers, locally. The Foundation (after payment of fully and regular corporate income taxes, at the newspaper corporation level) would be able to continue to make charitable grants of a magnitude consistent with its generous 30-year history.

If, as section 292 of the Senate Finance Committee version of H.R. 4961 recognizes, it is appropriate for the ownership of the Broadmoor Hotel to be retained by the El Pomar Foundation, and the ownership of the Houston Chronicle with an average daily circulation of less than 500,000 to be retained by the Houston Endowment, it is no less appropriate for the Spartanburg Herald & Journal, the Gadsden Times and the Tuscaloosa News, with combined average daily circulation, of approximately 110,000 (less than one-fourth that of the Chronicle) to be retained, in order to prevent the further concentration of ownership of local newspapers and make possible continued generous local and national charitable grants by Public Welfare Foundation.

Under these amendments, safeguards against their potential abuse or misuse have been built in, for a Foundation to qualify must have been in existence prior to 1953, must have owned the newspapers involved since prior to December 31, 1966, and the newspapers must not have a combined average daily circulation in excess of 600,000.

Because Public Welfare Foundation's newspapers are owned and published through fully taxable subsidiaries, full corporate taxes will continue to be paid on the newspapers' income. Thus, no revenue loss should result if the proposed amendment is adopted for absent the requested legislation the Foundation would be required to divest itself of the three newspaper subsidiaries because of the 200-percent penalty tax otherwise imposed under section 4943(b).

Mr. President, in closing I want to say, because Public Welfare Foundation newspapers are owned and published through fully taxable subsidiaries, full corporation taxes will continue to be paid on the newspapers' income, thus no revenue loss shall result if the proposed amendment is adopted, for absent the requested legislation the Foundation would be required to divest itself of the three newspaper subsidiaries.

Mr. President, this has been submitted to the managers of the bill, the distinguished and able Senator from Kansas, the distinguished and able Senator from Louisiana and I believe they have agreed to accept the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. It has been cleared and checked with Commissioner Metzenbaum, so I think we are ready to go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. I support the amendment. I yield back my time.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the minority yield back its time?

All time is yielded back.

The amendment (UP No. 1136) was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1137

(Purpose: Making technical amendments)

Mr. SYMMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1137.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 529, line 15, strike out "$250" and insert in lieu thereof "$600".

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I believe that the provision requiring direct sellers who elect the alternative method to file blank 1099 forms; that is, the blank 1099's with names and social security numbers, for people who have received less than $50 in bonuses for the year but who have purchased more than $250 worth of products in a year for resale is unreasonable.

First, it adds to the tremendous burden of paperwork already borne by the small business person, yet gives little or no useful information as to his liabilities to the IRS.

Second, since these forms will be filled out by hand by the small business person and then most likely discarded by the IRS, this requirement will only add to the enormous amount of paperwork already received by the IRS.

Third, under most buy-sell systems, the direct seller filling out these blank 1099 forms on other direct sellers has no knowledge of how much, if any, of the product was bought for resale.

The purchase of $250 worth of products in a year for resale is an unrealistic threshold by which to determine whether someone is in business to generate a profit. In fact, most companies' sales kits cost more than $250.

Mr. President, the amendment is a very simple amendment. It has been approved by the minority, by the majority, by Treasury, and all other parties. It very simply makes a change which will probably in the end raise more revenue for the Treasury.

I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. This particular amendment has been under discussion even prior to the Senate Finance Committee markup, and it has been worked out to the satisfaction of the Treasury because of the diligent efforts of the Senator from Idaho. I am willing to accept the amendment. I think there is no objection on the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the minority yield back its time?

Mr. LONG. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment (UP No. 1137) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SYMMS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1138

(Purpose: Relating to transitional rules for leasing)

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1138.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 235, lines 5 and 6, strike out "June 25, 1981" and insert in lieu thereof "June 25, 1981 (March 31, 1981, in the case of property described in section 211(d)(5)(B) of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982)".

On page 245, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

(5) Special rule for certain property used in the production of paper.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of property described in subparagraph (B), paragraph (2)(B) shall be applied by substituting "March 31, 1981" for "June 25, 1981".

(B) PROPERTY USED IN PRODUCTION OF PAPER.—Property is described in this subparagraph is such property is used in the production of paper.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, this is in the nature of a technical amendment which would change the transition for property used in the production of paper from June 25, 1981, to March 31, 1981. An eligible property would be property used only in the production of paper. The reason for this is to accommodate a major construction project which was started early in order to accommodate the particular needs of the State of Maine and those in New England; namely, the very short construction period. This is a very important project in my State. It would employ some 200 workers when the project is complete. We have very high unemployment. Paper companies are perhaps the major employer in the State. It has the support of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) is joining me in this effort, and I know of no objection to it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this involves the transition rule. It has been worked out with the help of the Treasury and both Senators from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. DOLE. I know of no objection to the amendment.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. COHEN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1138) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has an amendment. He has been waiting all day.

[The following proceedings occurred after midnight:]

AMENDMENT NO. 1975

Purpose: Relating to application of at risk rules in leasing situation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider my amendment at this time. The amendment is No. 1975. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON), for himself and Mr. NUNN, proposes an amendment numbered 1975.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 242, line 8, strike out "(J)" and insert "(K)".

On page 243, line 11, strike out the end quotation marks and the end period.

On page 243, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following:

"(J) COORDINATION WITH AT RISK RULES.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of section 465, in the case of property placed in service after the date of the enactment of this subparagraph, if—

"(I) an activity involves the leasing of section 1245 property which is qualified leased property with respect to which an election is in effect under subparagraph (A), and

"(II) the lessee of such property (as determined under this paragraph) would, but for this paragraph, be treated as the owner of such property for purposes of this title, then the lessor (as so determined) shall be considered to be at risk with respect to such property in an amount equal to the amount the lessee is considered at risk with respect to such property (determined under section 465 without regard to this paragraph).

"(ii) SUBPARAGRAPH NOT TO APPLY TO CERTAIN SERVICE CORPORATIONS.—Clause (i) shall not apply to any lessor which is a corporation the principal function of which is the performance of services in the field of health, law, engineering, architecture, accounting, actuarial science, performing arts, athletics, or consulting.".

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of Senator TSONGAS, Senator HEFLIN, Senator MOYNIHAN, Senator BENTSEN, Senator PERCY, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, and Senator DURENBERGER be added as cosponsors of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the amendment I am offering today, along with my distinguished colleague and cosponsor, Senator SAM NUNN, the ranking member of the Senate Small Business Committee, and others, is designed to eliminate the discrimination against closely held corporations under the Treasury Department's tax leasing regulations.

In other words, the sole purpose of this amendment is to treat small businesses exactly as large businesses are treated under the safe harbor leasing provisions recommended by the Finance Committee in the Tax Equity Act of 1982.

Currently, because of the Treasury's application of the so-called at-risk rules, closely held corporations are virtually precluded from buying another company's tax credits. Closely held corporations, those in which 50 percent or more of the stock is held by five or fewer shareholders, are, for the most part, small businesses. I see no valid reason for excluding a vital component of the business world from taking advantage of safe harbor leasing.

The costs are minimal compared to the rise in investment we hope to witness by modifying the at-risk rules to include closely held corporations. Although it is difficult to arrive at the exact revenue impact of this proposal, with the exclusion of professional corporations from the benefits of these leasing provisions, the Joint Tax Committee has estimated the loss of this provision at $90 million over the next 3 years. Professionals, such as lawyers, athletes, actors, and doctors, will continue to be prohibited from using safe harbor leasing as a tax shelter.

In a Small Business Committee hearing held March 2, 1982, Mr. John Chapoton, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy, testified that the Treasury would not oppose a legislative solution to bring about equality in this area.

The benefits of leasing extend to many sectors of the business community—from manufacturing to agriculture, with the net farm income for the period 1981-82 as low as the depression years and small business investment depressed, it makes no sense to me to restrict this potential investment and growth.

This amendment has the support of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Small Business Association, the National Federation of Independent Businesses, the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors, Small Business United (representing seven regional small business associations including "SBANE"), the National Venture Capital Association, the Southeast Lumber Manufacturers' Association, the National Association of Small Business Investment Companies, the National Association of Development Companies, and others.

My good friend and colleague, SAM NUNN of Georgia, said in his statement on behalf of the bill we introduced, "If leasing is to remain, I cannot justify the continued arbitrary exclusion of a vital sector of our Nation's economy." Nor can any of us justify it, Mr. President, and so I commend this amendment to my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that letters from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and others be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
July 20, 1982.

Hon. ALAN J. DIXON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DIXON: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce supports your effort to make safe-harbor leasing available to closely-held companies. This change will benefit many of our 255,000 members, more than 85 percent of which are small firms. Safe-harbor leasing is an essential part of the Economy Recovery Tax Act and deserves to be extended to small, closely-held campanies. Without this change, small businesses which are viable but temporarily unprofitable. are at a disadvantage compared to both larger firms and profitable small firms. Your amendment would help create the "level playing field" everyone professes to seek.

Cordially,

HILTON DAVIS,
Vice President.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT COMPANIES,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1982.

Hon. ALAN J. DIXON,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DIXON: I wish to express the support of our Association for the Dixon-Nunn Amendment to the pending tax revenue measure, S. 4961.

The National Association of Small Business Investment Companies believes that your amendment removing unwarranted obstacles to the use of safe harbor leasing by closely-held businesses is in the best interests of the national economy in general and of the independent sector in particular.

Thank you for taking the lead in pressing for this important change in S. 4961.

Sincerely,

WALTER B. STULTS,
President.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WHOLESALER-DISTRIBUTORS,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1982.

Hon. ALAN J. DIXON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DIXON: I was heartened to hear that you were co-sponsoring legislation to eliminate the application of the 465 "at risk" rules to Safe Harbor Leasing.

I also understand the Treasury Department supports this position provided an exclusion for professional corporations is included. We have no problems with that position.

As you know, NAW and other small business groups testified at hearings before the Senate Small Business Committee, urging, in the interest of equity, that the arbitrary and discriminatory application of section 465 to Safe Harbor lessors be eliminated.

There is no rational justification for that provision and we strongly support your effort to amend the Senator Finance Committee revenue package (H.R. 4961) to achieve that technical change.

As always, your sensitivity to the concerns of small business is greatly appreciated.

If we can be of any assistance, please let me know.

JOHN H. FITCH, JR.,
Vice President,
Government Relations.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my good friend, and colleague on the Senate Small Business Committee, Senator DIXON, in cosponsoring this amendment to insure that small businesses are statutorily permitted to participate in the safe harbor leasing program which we enacted last year as part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act.

As enacted in 1981, the safe-harbor leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act permit owners of property who cannot use the tax benefits of ownership—such as the accelerated cost recovery system (ACRS) depreciation and the investment tax credit—to lease some of these tax benefits to taxpayers who can use them. The safe-harbor leasing provisions essentially guarantee that, for Federal tax purposes, qualifying transactions will be treated as leases, and the lessor will be treated as the owner of the property.

Despite the debate about the process by which the leasing provisions were enacted, and the obvious overuse of the permitted transactions by certain major corporations, the leasing statute on its face appears to expressly permit most small business to purchase tax benefits from other losing companies.

Regrettably, Treasury's leasing regulations discriminate against small business by denying closely held corporations the opportunity to take advantage of the provisions in safe harbor leasing to buy another company's unused investment tax credits and depreciation deductions as well as others are allowed to do. Closely held corporations are generally defined as a company where 50 percent or more of the stock is held by five or fewer shareholders, and are predominantly small businesses.

The exclusion for these firms from the lessor side of the safe harbor transaction comes not from anything in the leasing provisions themselves, but rather through Treasury's application of the so-called at-risk rules established in secton 465 of the Internal Revenue Code. That section limits the losses that certain companies may deduct from their taxes to an amount equal to the amount at risk in a particular activity. According to Treasury, the concept of the at-risk rules which were first introduced in the Tax Reform Act of 1976 was a measure to restrict tax shelters by affecting the timing, as opposed to the calculation, of deductions. The at-risk rules require that deductions be matched dollar for dollar with the taxpayer's investment. Generally, individuals, subchapter S corporations, and closely held businesses are subject to the at-risk rules.

In a speech to the Tax Society of New York University on October 5, 1981, after the enactment of the leasing statute but before Treasury issued its regulations, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy John Chapoton stated that the regulations would apply the at-risk rules only to the lessee of the equipment, not the lessor, consistent in his view then, with the underlying purpose of the leasing statue. However, in the regulations which were issued, Treasury concluded that the at-risk rules had to be applied to certain lessors in the safe harbor leasing scheme. With the application of the at-risk rules, and safe harbor lessee or lessor that is subject to the at-risk rules have restrictions placed on the timing of both the ACRS deductions and the investment credit available because of the lease. Treasury readily acknowledges that, because of the at-risk rules, closely held corporations may be effectively precluded from safe harbor leasing by operation of the at-risk rules. Furthermore, it was Treasury's often repeated view, despite the inequity, that they could not change this result in regulations without express statutory authority.

The amendment I am today cosponsoring with Senator DIXON will provide Treasury with that express statutory authority.

Mr. President, we on the Senate Small Business Committee were concerned about the application of the at-risk rules to safe harbor leasing which acted to arbitrarily preclude certain businesses from participating as lessors. On March 2, 1982, under the leadership of Senator WEICKER, the chairman of the committee, and Senator D'AMATO, the chairman of the Urban and Rural Economic Development Subcommittee, our committee held a hearing on the usability of safe harbor leasing by small business. At that hearing, Assistant Secretary Chapoton responded to my questions to the Department's position on legislation such as we are introducing today.

I specifically asked Secretary Chapoton:

Senator NUNN. I understand you are saying this morning that Treasury will not oppose a carefully drafted legislative amendment repealing the application of the at-risk rules to the lessor. Is that right?

Mr. CHAPOTON. That is right.

Senator NUNN. Do you have such a proposal yourself?

Mr. CHAPOTON. We have not actually drafted one, but we certainly have in mind what we would not oppose.

Senator NUNN. Will this be not opposing it or will this be an official administration endorsement?

Mr. CHAPOTON. It would be an endorsement of such a proposal. In view of the controversy of the leasing provisions, we do not feel that we should now be coming forward to broaden the leasing rules, but we are certainly not going to oppose this change.

I trust that Secretary Chapoton's view will still hold for this amendment.

This proposal is similar in substance to the bill Senator DIXON and I jointly sponsored last week (S. 2733). That legislation was explicit in its treatment of the at-risk rules by amendment to section 465 of the Internal Revenue Code which contains those rules. However, because of the parliamentary situation under which the pending legislation has been brought to the floor for consideration, it would be impossible to offer that bill as an amendment. Rather we have had to rewrite the proposal to conform to the legislative form now pending.

But there is one substantive difference between our bill and this amendment. At the suggestion of Treasury, we have made it clear that, even though the at-risk rules would be modified for closely held corporations, professional corporations—such as doctors, lawyers, and even athletes—would not be exempt.

If this amendment is adopted, as it should be, the effect will be that closely held corporations will be subjected to the same requirements, and open to receive the same benefits, as other businesses are.

Mr. President, I know we are very concerned about the revenue impact of this bill. Based upon the best informal estimates that we have been able to obtain from both the Treasury and the Joint Tax Committee is that the amendment, with the exclusion of the professional corporations, will have a maximum revenue loss of $50 million in each of the next 3 years.

Despite the merits of removing this artificial barrier to small business participation as lessors in the safe harbor leasing transaction, there is still a question whether there will be a surge in the use of these leases by small businesses. Like their counterparts in the business community, small business is feeling the effects of the current recession, and the unacceptably high interest rates. But unlike their fellow larger businesses, small business is far less capable of withstanding the duration of the current economic downturn. The number of small business failures grows daily, shattering almost all previous records. There may not be many small businesses which are financially capable of participating as a lessor in a safe harbor lease transaction, but, to the extent that small business is capable, they should not be prevented from participation.

Mr. President, I still have serious reservations that leasing is an efficient way of addressing the pent-up investment desires of the industrial sector. I have even deeper reservations that we should, or must compensate businesses because they are unable to fully utilize all of their available tax credits and deductions. Even the most recently revised Treasury estimates of the revenue loss to the Government with the current leasing law is $41 billion cumulatively through fiscal year 1987. But if leasing is to remain, I cannot justify the continued arbitrary exclusion of a vital sector of our Nation's economy.

Mr. President, I congratulate Senator DIXON for taking the leadership of this issue, particularly at this time. I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of his amendment, and to work with him and others to see that this anomaly is reversed as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the amendment has been cleared with the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the manager of the bill, and other Members who are concerned with this subject. I shall appreciate the support of the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this amendment involves closely held corporations. It is an amendment we considered in the committee. It was offered at that time by the distinguished Senator from New York. We were told at that time—and the reason why it was not accepted in the committee—that it had a $300 million price tag. We have since learned that that was exaggerated about tenfold, so I apologize to the Senator from New York. Had we known that, we would have taken it that evening.

The amendment is now being offered by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and I know of no objection to the amendment. I know that the Senator from New York supports the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the chairman for his gracious remarks.

Those things happen, and, characteristically, he handles them in the end. I do appreciate this. It is a sensible amendment.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DIXON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1975) was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1139

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN) for himself and Mr. PERCY proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1139.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 292, strike out lines 4 through 12 and insert in lieu thereof, the following:

(f) EFFECTIVE DATES.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to distributions after August 31, 1982, except that such amendments shall not apply to distributions which are either:

(i) made by any corporation if—

(1)(A) on July 22, 1982, there was a ruling request by such corporation pending with the Internal Revenue Service as to whether such distributions would qualify as a partial liquidation, or

(B) within the 1-year period ending on July 12, 1982, the Internal Revenue Service granted a ruling to such corporation that the distributions would qualify as a partial liquidation, and

(2) such distributions are pursuant to a plan of partial: liquidation adopted by the corporation's board of directors before September 1, 1982 (or, if later, 90 days after the date on which the Internal Revenue Service granted a ruling pursuant to the request described in paragraph (1) (A)).

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, this is in the nature of a technical amendment designed to alter the transitional rule under section 226 of the bill relating to corporate takeovers. The amendment would permit companies which are in the middle of corporate restructuring to complete the corporate transaction without a tax penalty. The transaction involved would not involve the abuse to which section 226 is directed. Any company in position to be covered by this amendment would have already incurred substantial costs planning this corporate transaction and complying with applicable Federal law. It would be unfair to have this new provision apply to pending cases.

I understand this amendment will not affect the revenue projections of the bill because the provision was not intended to catch pending situations, but rather only future transactions.

I know of no opposition to the amendment in the Senate or at the Treasury and I hope the managers of this bill can accept it.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this amendment with the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN).

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD my letter to the chairman of the Committee on Finance dated July 21, 1982.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BOB: I hope you will lend your support to an amendment being sought by an Illinois company to the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act.

The amendment, a copy of which is attached, would add a transition rule to Title II concerning mergers and acquisitions. This transition rule would allow my constituent company to complete a partial liquidation which was devised by the company in order to minimize the possibility of an unfriendly takeover. I understand that one of the purposes of the changes proposed in H.R. 4961 is to make the tax laws less conducive to takeovers. Ironically, without a transition rule in this case, the Illinois company could very well become a target of just the type of takeover the Finance Committee is seeking to avoid.

Work on this transaction began last winter and so far the company has spent over $750,000 in connection with the project. I am unable to disclose the name of the company because it is in the midst of a filing with the SEC and such disclosure is illegal. However I do know it to be a major Illinois company with operations in several other states including Mississippi. My distinguished and able colleague Thad Cochran and I agree that this amendment is essential to insure justice and fairness.

I would appreciate any assistance you could lend us on adding such a transition rule to this legislation.

Warm personal regards,

[SIGNED]

CHARLES H. PERCY,
United States Senator.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield

Mr. METZENBAUM. The amendment appears not to be objectionable, but I want to be certain this amendment has nothing to do with the Gulf Oil-Cities Service merger.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is not the intention of this Senator to affect that in any way whatsoever. This is not related in any way to the Gulf Oil Co.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

I have no objection.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this matter was brought to my attention by both Senators from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS and Mr. COCHRAN).

Present law treatment of a partial liquidation would continue to apply to any distribution if the distributing corporation has a ruling request pending with the Internal Revenue Service on July 22, 1982, seeking partial liquidation treatment, or the corporation was granted a ruling within 1 year prior to July 12, 1982, that the distributions would qualify as a partial liquidation. In either case, the plan of partial liquidation must be adopted by the corporation's board of directors before September 1, 1982, or, if later, within 90 days after the date on which the ruling granting a partial liquidation treatment is granted.

So far as I know, there is no objection to the amendment. It is another one of those transition rules, and—as the Senator from Ohio questioned—it does not affect Gulf Oil Co.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1139) was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of Senator STENNIS be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are getting down to about four amendments on which there will be rollcall votes. If Senators who have those amendments will withhold for a few moments, I think there are two other amendments we might dispose of.

The Senator from Rhode Island has one AFDC amendment which has been cleared. Senator WALLOP, Senator TOWER, and perhaps Senator PRESSLER have amendments. That would leave the amendment of the Senator from Alaska, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), and the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), unless we have forgotten someone.

Mr. D'AMATO. The Senator from New York.

Mr. DOLE. Excuse me. That is in process. That could be a major amendment. Also, Senator GORTON has an amendment. We have made some agreement with Senator GORTON on the airplanes.

SEC. 163. Delayed effective date in cases requiring State legislation.

On page 32, amend the table of contents by adding the following item after the item referring to section 173:

SEC. 174. Delayed effective date in cases requiring State legislation.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, this amendment has been cleared with both sides. The amendment does two things.

First, it requires that the numerous changes mandated by H.R. 4961 for AFDC, Child Support Enforcement (CSE) and Supplemental Security Income (SSI) be implemented on October 1, 1982, rather than on the date of enactment as proposed by the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act.

The justification for such an amendment is that the numerous and complicated changes mandated by H.R. 4961 cannot feasibly be implemented in August when passage of the act is expected.

Second, it adds language to H.R. 4961 that allows waivers of the effective date when State law impedes either immediate implementation or implementation on October 1, 1982, of provisions of the bill relative to AFDC, CSE, and SSI. Under this amendment the Secretary must find that an October 1, 1982, implementation date is not possible. The State will then have until the end of its legislative session to bring into compliance its laws relating to the changes.

This amendment gives reasonable consideration to the possibility that State laws may conflict with the new Federal statutes and allows time for States to repeal or revise these laws. These amendments parallel last year's budget cutting legislation (Public Law 97-35), which took effect at the start of the fiscal year and allowed for the same limited waiver authority.

The bill before the Senate provides that changes in AFDC, SSI, and child support enforcement be effective on enactment. Obviously, it is impossible that those complicated changes can be effective on enactment, so we provide that they be effective on October 1.

In those instances where State law changes are required, the Secretary of HHS can give the State a waiver in order to come into compliance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) be added as a cosponsor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I move its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. DOLE. I understand the Senator from New York is a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am a cosponsor.

Mr. DOLE. I support the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield back our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment (UP No. 1140) was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the manager of the bill yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, what is the manager's intention with respect to the proceedings today?

Mr. DOLE. I think we are making good progress, and I hope we might finish this morning.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Senator know if it is the intention then to be in session on Friday, if we continue to stay on this morning and finish this bill? Do we intend then to be in session Friday?

Mr. DOLE. I can consult the majority leader and perhaps—in fact I think he is now meeting or discussing with the minority leader. Perhaps they will have an announcement.

He is not discussing with the minority leader as the minority leader is seated there at the table. [Laughter.]

It would have been a good idea, I guess.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Congress has for more than two decades acted on the belief that a society which expects its citizens to do all they can for their country when they are well is a society which must do all it can for its citizens when they are ill.

Congress created the medicare health insurance program for the Nation's elderly and disabled. It created the medicaid health insurance program for low-income families. It enacted legislation to allow all Americans to claim a tax deduction for extraordinary medical expenses.

Today, Congress debates the Tax Reconciliation Act of 1982. It contains many positive provisions to control the rampant inflation in the cost of health and hospital services which affect every single American. But it also contains provisions which would alter significantly our two decade old commitment to providing health care to elderly, disabled, and disadvantaged Americans. The legislation, as approved by the Finance Committee, would require elderly and disabled Americans to pay $1.4 billion more for their health care over the next 3 years. It would require low-income Americans to contribute toward the cost of most health services received. It would alter the current tax deduction for extraordinary medical expenses so that only those expenses which exceeded 7 percent of an individual's income could be deducted.

Of particular concern are the medicare provisions which would force the elderly and disabled, who require three times more medical assistance than other Americans, to contribute greater amounts toward the cost of their health care.

The Finance Committee approved changes in the medicare program to increase the amount of the deductible which the elderly and disabled are required to pay for physician services. This would cost these Americans an additional $475 million over the next 3 years.

The Finance Committee approved a provision to require the elderly and disabled to pay 25 percent of the medicare program's costs by increasing the monthly insurance premium paid. This change is but a poorly disguised reduction in social security benefits, as the monthly premium is automatically subtracted from social security checks. It would cost these Americans an additional $750 million over the next 3 years.

The Finance Committee approved a provision to require those individuals receiving medical services in the home to pay for a portion of the cost of each visit. This change would cost an additional $175 million over the next 3 years.

The Finance Committee also approved a provision to eliminate the Federal payment to the States to purchase medicare insurance for physician services on behalf of medicaid beneficiaries.

Why should the Senate oppose these changes?

First, they do not serve to reduce Federal costs for health care. They merely shift those costs to the elderly, disabled, and disadvantaged citizens of this Nation. Hospitals and other providers of health care shift the costs to all their patients. Insurance companies raise the costs of their premiums they charge for the supplemental medical insurance the elderly and disabled are forced to buy because of the inadequacies in Federal health programs. Fully $5 billion in health and hospital costs were shifted to medicare and medicaid beneficiaries in 1981 because of changes approved by Congress. The reductions in medicare and medicaid proposed today are three times the amount already approved.

Second, the proposals to increase the amount which the elderly and disabled must pay for this health care will not, as some claim, make them more cautious in seeking health care because they are more conscious of those costs. But I ask my colleagues, how much more conscious of these costs can they be when you consider that they are already paying 40 percent of the health costs out of their own pockets, an overwhelming $1,400 a year?

How much more aware of the costs of health care do we need to make them when they are already paying 20 percent of their income for health and hospital care? Coverage under medicare has become so inadequate that the elderly are paying as much of their income for health care as they were before the medicare program was enacted in 1965.

If the medicare and medicaid reconciliation proposals before Congress are adopted in full, elderly and disabled Americans will pay 79 percent more in 1987 for the health services they need than they did in 1981. Seventy-nine percent, Mr. President, cannot be tolerated by the elderly, by those in Congress who continue to believe in the commitment of which I have already spoken.

Third, the Finance Committee's proposal will, in some cases, serve to increase the Federal Government's expenditures for health care. Its proposal to institute copayments for home health services received by medicare beneficiaries makes no sense. Enactment of this provision will discourage the use of home health services by the 6 million elderly Americans whose incomes are at or near the poverty line.

Study after study has shown that home health services are far less costly than care provided in an institution or nursing home. They have shown that as many as 1 in 4 of the Nation's nursing home residents could be cared for at home, at a lesser cost, if adequate home health services were available. Federal expenditures for nursing home care were 10 times that for home health care. If we are to reduce Federal expenditures for long-term care for elderly and disabled individuals with chronic illnesses, then we should be encouraging the growth, not the limitation of home health services.

There are many ways in which to reduce the soaring hospital and medical costs which affect all Americans. There are many ways in which to reduce the Federal Government's share of these costs without requiring the elderly and disabled to pay even more for their health care. I support many of the Finance Committee's proposals to adjust the amount and manner in which the Government provides payments to hospitals for care provided to elderly Americans. The committee approved several changes which will forcefully address rising hospital costs by limiting annual increases in hospital reimbursement under medicare, and by requiring a change in the way hospitals are reimbursed from the current retrospective, or after the fact basis, to a prospective basis under which hospitals agree in advance to provide care for a set cost.

I support other provisions approved by the Senate Finance Committee to limit costs for certain physician services and care provided by nursing homes. And I support the committee's proposal to increase funding for the medicare contractors program. Under this program, investigations are undertaken to determine the validity of payments made to medicare providers of health care. It has been estimated that for every $1 spent for this program, $5 is recovered by the Government through the rejection of invalid medical claims, If necessary, I will offer an amendment to expand this program in the Senate Appropriations Committee to recover $300 million in medicare waste, fraud, and abuse.

These are but a few of the actions which Congress could and should take to reduce health inflation and spending. It need not resort to further increasing the financial burden on elderly and disabled Americans.

During the course of debate on this legislation, I supported amendments offered by Senators BRADLEY and BAUCUS to eliminate the harmful provisions of the Tax Reconciliation Act. I regret that the Senate did not approve these amendments. It did, at least, approve the minor modifications proposed by Senator DURENBERGER to limit the increase in what elderly and disabled Americans will have to pay for their health care from the original $1.4 billion to $1 billion. I will support all other amendments which will further decrease this burden on these citizens.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) in the Chamber? Is the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) in the Chamber?

While they are coming perhaps we should proceed with the amendment of the Senator from Alaska. He has been waiting patiently. Then the Senator from Ohio will follow the Senator from Alaska.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1141

(Purpose: To clarify provisions relating to Section 189 of the Internal Revenue Code)

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider my amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS), for himself and Mr. MURKOWSKI, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1141.

At page 228, strike the period at the end of line 20 and add the following, ", but shall not apply to the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System (15 U.S.C. § 719) and its related facilities.".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

This amendment is cosponsored by my colleague from Alaska.

Mr. President, this amendment relates to the effective date provisions of section 209 of the bill. Section 209 of the bill would amend section 189 of the code in order to require that corporations capitalize and amortize construction period interest and taxes attributable to the construction of nonresidential real property. Under present law, the capitalization requirement is only applicable to individuals and closely held corporations.

My amendment to the effective date provisions of the bill merely makes it clear that the provisions of section 189, as amended, will not be applicable to the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System and related facilities.

Mr. President, I expect most Senators would be surprised to know that the revenue estimates for buildings covered by section 189 includes property such as pipelines, particularly in light of the statement by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chapoton, before the Finance Committee at the time this change was voted. Let me read you Mr. Chapoton's answer to the Senator from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, when asked what types of properties are covered by section 189:

Mr. BENTSEN. Let me understand then would it include structures affixed to the ground, such as farm implement sheds, pipelines, the rest of it?

Mr. CHAPOTON. No, it would not. It would include only buildings.

Only after the vote of the Finance Committee were Senators told that the revenue estimates for the measure do include pipelines. While revenue estimates are not law they should be consistent with what Senators are told is the intended effect of a change in law. My amendment, then, seeks to make clear that the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System is not covered by this change to section 189. Exclusion of the project has little or no impact on the revenue estimates for this bill.

Specifically for fiscal years 1983 and 1984 there would be no revenue cost for the Alaska pipeline project under section 189. Under the present schedules, interest and taxes for the project would not commence until 1985 at the earliest. In 1985, there is only a small revenue impact—approximately $20 million—due to deduction of interest and taxes by the Alaska pipeline project.

The real issue is there is no Federal tax revenue to be counted unless the project is built. I hope Senators are very clear on this point—a change in the tax rules for the Alaska pipeline project at this point may close off any possibility of raising the massive capital required to build it.

The opposite is also true, however, for when the Alaska pipeline project is complete the Federal Government stands to collect billions in future revenues—sums that would dwarf any supposed "loss" of revenues attributed to this amendment. The revenue estimators cannot have it both ways. They cannot count losses to revenue from passage of my amendment and ignore the revenue losses if this project fails due to a retroactive change in the tax laws for a national energy project.

The construction of the Alaska pipeline project has been delayed because of the uncertain economic conditions. The issuance of the permanent certificate of convenience and necessity by the FERC has also been delayed. The delay has increased the financial risks to the companies involved in the project, which were already enormous. Hundreds of millions of dollars have already been spent by those companies. The provisions of the existing tax law, including the deductibility of construction period interest and taxes, are an integral part of the companies' plans and expectations. This proposal, assuming that it is applicable to pipelines, amounts to changing the rules in the middle of the game.

The potential consequences of this legislation on the Alaska pipeline project will be to increase the difficulty of obtaining adequate financing. Because of the very long construction period, the companies will be required to forgo interest and tax deductions for some 5 years, and only then begin to recover those lost deductions over the next 10 years. This change in the tax law dramatically affects the rate of return to the sponsor companies involved, and such a change, after the companies involved have spent literally hundreds of millions in reliance upon the current law, is unfair and unnecessary.

Congress has on numerous occasions expressed its support for expeditious delivery of gas from this national energy project. No other national project offers us the chance to dramatically increase the security of our energy supplies which can be obtained by completion of the Alaska gas pipeline. This legislation, unintentionally and inappropriately, places an even greater burden on the companies seeking to add this natural resource to our existing available energy supplies.

My amendment only looks for equitable treatment for the Alaska pipeline project. The bill, as presently written, exempts any taxpayer who begins construction of a project before the end of the year. Because of Federal regulatory requirements the Alaska pipeline project cannot begin until it receives all necessary permits. Under this bill, a taxpayer who turns a shovel of dirt between now and the end of the year is exempted. Meanwhile, a national energy project that has already spent hundreds of millions of dollars on capital expenditures may not be exempted. This is patently absurd.

Let me summarize why this amendment is so important and why it is consistent with our purpose in this bill.

First, it has virtually no revenue impact during the 3 years covered by the budget resolution.

Second, it is consistent with the understanding given to the members of the Senate Finance Committee when they approved this provision.

Third, it is vital to the future of a national energy project—the Alaska gas pipeline—which may never be constructed if we change the tax rules for the project in midstream.

I hope my colleagues will give serious thought to an apparently unintended impact of this bill. I ask them to support this amendment and our country's energy future.

Mr. President, I placed on each Member's desk a letter concerning this amendment.

Very simply the bill changes the process for the treatment of interest and taxes during construction on a major project. The Alaska natural gas pipeline is already under construction, in our opinion. Over $400 million has been spent on that project. The rights of way have been initiated, and the surveying has been initiated. But the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission requires that the project's proponents demonstrate that it has $30 billion up front before they can start laying the pipe.

In order to meet the FERC requirement showing that sufficient capital is available to complete this project, the very fact that interest and taxes during construction could be expensed is part of the financing plan. If the provisions of the bill as they appear in section 209 amending section 189 of the existing code is applied to the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System, it may well mean that it would destroy the financing ability of the pipeline.

I urge Members of the Senate to examine the letter that my colleague and I have made available to the Senate and urge Senators to support this amendment which I consider to be a technical one.

This project cannot afford the uncertainty of whether or not a court would rule that the pipeline is already under construction for purposes of section 189. Without my amendment section 189 may destroy the financing capability of those who seek to obtain the money to build this enormous project.

Remember, this project will bring nearly 15 percent of the Nation's known gas reserves to market in the south 48. The 2,600-mile pipeline will be the largest project completed in this country and the largest privately financed project in the world.

Incidentally, it is not as large as the Russian pipeline which will be 4,200 miles in length, but the Russian system does not face the requirement of a Federal Energy Regulatory Commission telling them the money has to be up front before they can lay pipe. Governments of countries purchasing Siberian gas are subsidizing the Russian pipeline. That is why it is going ahead and ours is not.

Mr. President, I am pleased to answer any questions about the amendment. I am hopeful it will be accepted.

I might state it has no revenue loss in 1983 and 1984 because the pipeline is not under construction. It is held in abeyance right now because of inability to prove the availability of $30 billion committed before the project is commenced.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask the minority manager and the minority side to yield to me 10 minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Under the rules, if the manager of the bill or the majority leader favors the amendment, is not the time assigned to the minority?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LONG. Then if the majority favors the amendment, I would assume the time would be assigned to me in opposition.

Does the Senator desire 5 iminutes?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Ten minutes.

Mr. LONG. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement before he starts?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, sometime ago it became obvious that we could not finish this bill by 12 o'clock midnight. As I indicated this morning, I had hoped we could do that and I would not ask the Senate to remain past midnight.

Once again I proved that I am not a good prophet, not a reliable prognosticator.

I am going to ask the Senate to stay past 12 o'clock not because I am anxious to stay any more than anyone else is but it seems clear to me we are within striking distance of finishing and it also seems clear from the conversation of Members that it is our preference that we stay tonight and complete action on this measure.

Mr. President, therefore, I wish to announce that we will stay and attempt to finish this bill tonight and assuming that we succeed in that, and I am sure we can, I will not ask the Senate to be in on Friday but instead will recess over until Monday next.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I agree with the majority leader that this will be the best course of action to take, that if the Senate does stay now and finish this, the Senate should not be in tomorrow.

I wish to ask the distinguished majority leader what his plans may be for taking up House Joint Resolution 494, the joint resolution with regard to the Presidential certification on conditions in El Salvador.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. He and I have had an opportunity to discuss that in the course of this day, and I in turn have discussed it with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS).

I may say in answer to the minority leader's question that if we are not in tomorrow, and I expect that to be the result, it would be my intention to try to schedule that either Monday or Tuesday.

I have no desire to see this go overboard by reason of the expiration of the deadline. I wish to consult with the chairman and with Senator HELMS on the choice of those days, but I do not expect then it to be a problem.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. I hope we will be able to bring it up on Monday because as I understand it Wednesday is the deadline.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. PERCY. I hope also it will be Monday, but I ask that it not be taken up until after 2 p.m. to accommodate the ranking minority Member.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will consult with all Senators and especially with the chairman and the ranking minority Member and the Senator from North Carolina who expressed a particular interest in this.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. Is there any chance of taking up the constitutional amendment for a balanced budget?

Mr. BAKER. I apologize to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I had looked for him and I did not find him, and it is my fault.

What I would like to do is to come back, if we finish late this morning on this bill, to recess over until Monday rather than Friday, and then we will be back on the constitutional amendment on Monday.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I just want to make the record clear. The earlier the better. I will be back. I would hope it would be taken up on Monday.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator and I will confer with him.

ORDER FOR CONVENING TIME FOR FRIDAY VITIATED

Mr. President, let me do it the way: I ask unanimous consent that the order for the Senate to convene on Friday at 9 o'clock be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. MONDAY, JULY 26

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business this day it stand in recess until Monday at 11 a.m.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is the Senator going to finish this bill tonight?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; we are going to finish this bill tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, am I correct in my understanding that the time used by the majority leader is not charged to the Senator from Ohio's time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. It is charged against the majority leader's time.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, deja vu, it is the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline revisited. Here we are again at 12:20 in the morning, and the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline is back to the U.S. Senate asking for special consideration. When I say special consideration I believe the Members of this body will recollect full well the debates that have occurred on the floor of this body concerning the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline, the waiver that the President gave to the instructions and law as enacted by a previous Congress and as set forth by a previous President.

You will recollect that the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline received special privileges about being able to charge consumers whether or not they were ever able to use the gas. The Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline has promised they would not include the cost of constructing the production facilities, but that was changed to the extent of $6 billion.

The Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline was not to have the oil companies owning a part of the production facilities. That was changed. All across the board the rules have been changed and changed and changed for the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline.

Let me explain what we have here this morning. The Committee on Finance, in its wisdom, saw fit to provide that corporations would be required to capitalize their interest and taxes during construction, and that is the way the bill reads. Now, I am not here advocating that position or opposed to it, although I commend the Committee on Finance for putting it into the law. That is the way the bill reads.

There is nothing in the bill that says there is a special exemption for the auto plants in Detroit or Cleveland; there is nothing in the bill that provides a special exemption for the steel companies in Pittsburgh, in Youngstown, in Alabama, and wherever they may be.

There is nothing in the bill that provides that any single segment of the economy has a special exemption. Oh, no. But one comes along and says, "We want a special exemption. We want to be treated specially. We have always been treated specially by the U.S. Congress."

They waived the laws as they were passed by prior administrations, prior congressional bodies, and now we come back and say, "OK. You said that construction has to be capitalized for everybody in the country, but the Stevens amendment that is on the floor at the moment says with the exception of the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline."

Nobody can give you any logical reason for that except the fact that it is special privilege, special treatment. Why? There is no reason why unless we just roll over and play dead, as we have in the past, for the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline in giving them whatever they want.

But if you are going to treat them in the same manner as every other industry in this country, then you have to vote "no" on the Stevens amendment because the Stevens amendment just provides for one single exception, and that exception is for the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline.

I think that is wrong, and I think we are talking about substantial numbers of dollars, not in 1983, not in 1984, because they cannot get it built as fast as they thought they were able to and as fast as they told us they would. But no matter how you slice it it will cost the American people additional dollars.

Several months ago we provided that the consumers would pick up the responsibility, that they would be exposed, that they would pay the costs if the pipeline was never built. Now we are back here saying to the American public, to all of the American public, "One more exemption, one more chance, one more opportunity for the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline to get special privileges."

I think it is wrong, Mr. President, and I hope this body will see fit to defeat the amendment.

I further hope that the managers of the bill will recognize the special privileges that are inherent in this amendment, and if the Alaska natural gas pipeline is to get those special privileges then every other single industry in this country is entitled to the same consideration, and you ought to repeal the amendment you just brought to the floor.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for asking for the yeas and nays. As a courtesy I am sure it is to allow the proponent of the amendment to ask for that in the event he wants to modify the amendment, but I do not want to modify this amendment, and as a matter of fact, I thank the Senator from Ohio for his support. Had he not spoken out that way I am sure many Members would have voted against the amendment.

We passed a similar amendment for the Senator from Utah to deal with the Marriott Corp. because their hotels have been held up due to local problems of clearance of zoning and other matters.

We cleared another amendment similarly on this subject.

As I indicated, our pipeline is under construction. I think $600 million expended on a project means it is under construction. But the project cannot stand the uncertainty the Senator from Ohio would enjoy instigating. I am certain the Senator from Ohio could decide to file suit against the Alaska pipeline again, and I am sure he has a great many of his young friends who are willing to take on cases like that. We are sorry to have to beat him in court so often, but it does take time that we can no longer afford.

I want to point out this does not lose any money for the Treasury. There is no way for this project to provide funds for the Treasury unless it can be constructed. I am sure all Members of the Senate know there was an announcement that project sponsors are going to delay the initiation of the project and are not attempting to get approval to initiate the project until interest rates and the general economy improve. Measures such as this may assure that no project will exist to provide gas to consumers or revenue for the Treasury.

But I do thank the Senator from Ohio for once again showing his impartiality in dealing with my State and the project that contemplates bringing gas to his constituents. I am sure his constituents will be very pleased to hear that he would rather see no transportation system or a higher cost system to provide them the enormous reserves known to exist and others likely to exist and to be served by this project.

Again, I really am indebted to him for his impartiality in dealing with any subject that applies to my State. I can assure him of a similar impartiality in any amendment or bill he brings before the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Alaska, because I have some reservations about this amendment, not that it may not be totally meritorious, but we had just to change the law, the change we just made that the Senator mentioned, the Senator from Alaska, very minor change, maybe hardly any cost at all, but this is substantial. I think it is $400 million and up if the pipeline is built.

Mr. STEVENS. That is right.

Mr. DOLE. I do not know whether the pipeline is going to be built or not. I had to leave the Chamber for a minute. Did the Senator from Alaska indicate why there should be a distinction with the Alaska pipeline, or does it not apply generally?

Mr. STEVENS. As I indicated, at the time this matter was before the Senator's committee, the distinguished Senator from Texas asked the representative of the Treasury Department whether this amendment covered—let me read from Senator BENTSEN's statement. He said:

Well, let me understand then would it include structures affixed to the ground, such as farm implement sheds, pipelines, the rest of it?

Mr. Chapoton said: "No, it would not. It would include only buildings."

The impact of this amendment was originally proposed by the Senator's Finance Committee and was not intended to cover pipelines. But our feeling is that the Alaska pipeline is under construction.

As I said, they have been in our State. They have cleared the right-of-way. They surveyed out a great portion of the right-of-way. But the problem is they have not laid any pipe. There is a chance the pipeline may not be considered to be under construction. So at the time Sponsors put the money in the ground for laying the pipeline, the argument could be raised that this pipeline was not under construction as a project and, therefore, the deadline of December 31 applies to it. That is, if this amendment to section 189 in the code applies to pipelines at all.

We know that there will be no pipeline laid before December 31 of this year. This project must not be subjected to the risk of failure to comply with a hypotechnical interpretation of this section.

The most important thing is there is no revenue loss now. There will not be any revenue loss until the pipeline is laid. But this section, if it is applied after the construction has commenced by $600 million, it means changing the rules for this pipeline—contrary to what the Senator from Ohio says, Congress is not changing the rules for any other project for which $600 million has been expended.

So we are not seeking an exception. We are seeking for the Senate to make the interpretation that this project is under construction now. If it is, then this section certainly will not apply to our project. I am not attempting to decide the question of whether it applies to pipelines in general.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am not going to allow the Senator from Alaska to stand on this floor alone as if this project only involves Alaska. I was in Glasgow, Mont., just a few weeks ago visiting with some of the pipeline inspectors that are looking at the welds of this pipeline that is already laid. That is the eastern leg.

I am quite familiar with the previous history of the legislation that has gone into the Alaska natural gas pipeline, the waiver provision that we had to adopt in order to find out whether a gas pipeline from Alaska was going to be built. And one of those provisions was the eastern leg. It is under construction. It will carry gas, if not from Alaska, from Alberta. It will carry gas through Montana into the Midwest to provide needs of natural gas consumers.

Now, whether or not the financing of this entire project from the Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska to the lower 48 States is going to be possible or not, I do not know. But the eastern leg is under construction.

Whom are we trying to kid around here? There are a lot of things in this tax bill I do not like, and this particular section of the bill is one of them. I do not know what this new addition to the tax law is going to do to future pipeline construction financing. But this particular pipeline, at least as far as the eastern leg, at least as far as the intent of Congress in adopting those waiver provisions in previous legislation, is under construction.

What the Senator from Alaska is trying to clarify is that there is no tomfoolery by the Department of the Treasury or by the courts to later say that, "Well, this pipeline wasn't under construction when this tax bill was adopted and therefore this new requirement for taxes applies to it."

I would prefer that we left this section entirely out of the bill because I do not know what it is going to do to future pipelines. After all, whatever the taxes are, whatever the cost of construction on any pipeline, whether it is oil or gas, is going to be paid by the consumer. Who do we think is going to pay for it? Certainly the people that build it are going to get the cost of construction, whatever it is, into the tariff base for transporting that gas or oil, whatever that amount is then paid by the consumers of the product.

So the main point that the Senator from Alaska has made is that, in our judgment, the Alaskan natural gas pipeline is already started under construction and, therefore, this section cannot apply to it. I am here to tell you that that is my judgment. I will tell everybody that wants to oppose this amendment that what is constructed there in eastern Montana out of Alberta is part of this system and what Congress intended when it adopted the waiver when all the provisions that went into this and previous legislation was that that is part of that system. Therefore, this amendment is a clear enunciation by Congress that this section of the bill clearly does not apply to this natural gas pipeline system.

If it is part of that system, perhaps the argument can be made: "Well, then, the section will not apply." Well, I am just here to say that I do not want any interpretation by the Secretary of the Treasury or the courts to lay that aside and say, "No, it wasn't started, because it wasn't started in Alaska."

Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. President, I was not familiar with this amendment, and I have heard two good arguments made. But let me just tell the Senate that when we draw up major bills like this and we fix effective dates, we usually do not fix those dates in a vacuum. We fix them with reference to what the situation is and we have a way of moving them forward or moving them back, depending on how the situation is going to work out. We do take into consideration things like the Alaska pipeline.

Do you want to say that the Alaska pipeline is not going to be able to deduct construction period interest and taxes, or are you going to say they are going to have to capitalize them and carry them forward?

It would be fair to ask, when we act on something of this sort, whether we want to change interest on construction loans to adversely affect the Alaskan pipeline.

Frankly, I do not recall if we focused on the matter. But it seems to me that when we agreed to an act of congressional authorization and Government policy, we wanted the pipeline to go forward and the law at that time would permit the deduction of construction period interest and taxes. It seems to me that if we focused on the issue, we would have said that we did want to allow these deductions for the Alaskan pipeline. It is underway; work is being done on the subject and a huge amount of money is being spent on it.

It seems to me that was the basic question we should have decided: did we want to stop the Alaskan pipeline or did we not want to stop the Alaskan pipeline. There is no doubt in my mind that if you had told these people when they were building the pipeline that you were going to make them capitalize their interest during the construction period, they would have had to stop dead in their tracks and probably start all over again.

My thought is that we ought to say that we do not intend to apply this to the Alaskan pipeline. Having heard the arguments for both sides, I am constrained to believe that if we want to build the Alaskan pipeline, we ought to go ahead and vote with the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. BENTSEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. BENTSEN. The interesting thing is we did address it that night. We referred specifically to it. The legislative language is there.

The Senator from Alaska has read my comment and read the reply of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for tax policy, section. He stated that this was excluded.

Now, what the Senator from Alaska is trying to do is further clarify that. Frankly, you have a unique situation when you try to build a pipeline of that magnitude. It is going to take a long time. And if you are talking about not being able to expense interest over that period, I think you put in jeopardy the construction of the pipeline. I think it is terribly important for the energy needs of our country and I am pleased to support the senior Senator from Alaska.

Mr. LONG. The fact is that the gas that we have in Louisiana and Texas is going to run out some day, and this country is going to be needing that Alaskan gas.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield such time as my colleague from Alaska desires.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank my colleague, the senior Senator from Alaska.

I rise to remind my colleagues that this was formulated as a multiyear project. The Senator from Montana is absolutely correct, the eastern leg is under construction and, as a matter of fact, the formal dedication of that will take place on October 5.

My point is that construction started under specific game rules and these game rules were that the builder can deduct interest and property taxes while construction is underway. To suggest that those game rules be changed at this juncture, I think, is truly unjust and certainly not in the best interests of our Nation or in our interest in securing a greater degree of energy independence.

I say to you that with the situation in the Mideast, we need all the domestic energy resources developed in this country that we possibly can, and the Alaska pipeline, which I will again remind you will be the largest privately financed construction project in the history of the free world, nearly $40 billion, needs to go forward under the same set of rules that were in effect when the program was originally initiated. Therefore, I urge my colleagues not to support any situation that would suggest that the rules be changed at this late time.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Texas pointed out, we had a misunderstanding about an amendment that he thought was in the bill. We went back and read the transcript, we listened to the recordings, and there was a misunderstanding. Someone from the joint committee had made one explanation, and the Senator from Texas directed the question to Mr. Chapoton, and he said it was covered. Then there was a later discussion. Everything was up in the air.

One reason I am concerned about this amendment—one reason I am not concerned is that it does not cost anything until 1985—is I wonder if we are being fair to the Senator from Texas who thought he had an agreement to cover all pipelines. We indicated to the Senator from Texas at that time it was a $500 million problem we could not handle. He graciously agreed that if that was the problem, he understood. Is that a correct recitation of what happened?

Mr. BENTSEN. I would say to the distinguished chairman that is correct. There apparently was a misunderstanding. But I also think in fairness to what the Senator from Alaska stated, the matter of facing long-term energy problems is so strong that I think we ought to specifically take care of this problem of charges during construction. I think they ought to be able to charge off interest and taxes during construction.

Mr. DOLE. I want the RECORD to show that this was discussed and the Senator from Texas understood that I was not telling him one thing while we were preparing to do another thing. That is a serious consideration. We did discuss it that night. We did not discuss it fully enough, it turns out. There was a $500 million misunderstanding. The Senator from Texas knows that we had a problem.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Kansas yield for a question?

The PRESIDIMG OFFICER. All time of the proponents has expired. The Senator from Louisiana has 3 minutes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is my understanding that as the bill comes to the floor, pipelines are treated as all other construction with respect to the expensing of taxes, with respect to capitalizing interest on taxes.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Therefore, if the amendment of the Senator from Alaska were to be agreed to, it would indeed provide a special exemption that does not exist for any other pipelines, for any other pipelines in the country; is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct. But it is probably based on a misunderstanding the night the committee met. But that is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. We are not seeking any special exemption. If the Alaska pipeline is under construction, this bill certainly does not cover it, does it?

Mr. LONG. That is my understanding.

Mr. STEVENS. All we are saying is that the Senate finds the Alaska pipeline is under construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 80, nays 16, as follows:

So Mr. STEVENS' Amendment (UP No. 1141) was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me, if I may, just have a minute. We have an amendment by both Senators from Texas that will take about 1 minute. The Senator from Wyoming, I think we have been able to accommodate. The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) I understand may have an amendment. Senator GORTON has an amendment which we could dispose of, I would think, within 2 minutes.

We have now worked out, I hope—I believe—the agreement with the Senators from New York, Mississippi, and Alaska.

The Senator from Mississippi wanted 20 minutes. We only have 33 minutes.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I wonder if I may inquire, I am delighted to know if anything can be worked out. I do not know what has been worked out. This is something that I have been very much involved in, but if there is going to be debate on it, I want to make sure that I am going to be able to manage at least some of the time or have some time myself.

Mr. DOLE. I will give the Senator most all the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas should know that all time left is now under the control of Senator LONG.

Mr. DOLE. Good. I would like to have the Senator finish this.

Mr. LONG. The Senator can have half of my time. Whatever I have I will share with him. That is a charitable proposition.

Mr. DOLE. I am not trying to foreclose anyone. The Senator from Montana has a very important amendment. If we lose something, we have got to repeal safe harbor leasing, so he is going to be the cleanup hitter. Maybe we can take these amendments that are very quick and then move on to the amendment of Senator PRYOR. Would that be all right?

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished manager that arrangement would be all right, providing I have at least a few moments to explain the amendment. I think if I do not have those moments——

Mr. DOLE. Fine.

Mr. PRYOR. How many more amendments are there, I would like to ask?

Mr. DOLE. I think there are three that can be disposed of within 5 minutes. That is keeping in mind the concerns of the Senator from Missouri. I know we can take care of the Senator from Texas right now. Let us do that one and then proceed.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1142

(Purpose: Relating to tax-exempt obligations)

Mr. TOWER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1142.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 278, line 6, insert ", the chief elected State legal officer of the executive branch," before "or".

On page 278, line 8, insert "chief elected executive" before "officer".

On page 287, after line 23, insert the following:

(d) POLLUTION CONTROL FACILITIES ACQUIRED BY REGIONAL POLLUTION CONTROL AUTHORITY.—Subsection (b) of section 103 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(12) POLUTION CONTROL FACILITIES ACQUIRED BY REGIONAL POLLUTION CONTROL AUTHORITIES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of subparagraph (F) of paragraph (4), an obligation shall be treated as described in such subparagraph if it is part of an issue substantially all of the proceeds of which are used by a qualified regional pollution control authority to acquire existing air or water pollution control facilities which the authority itself will operate in order to maintain or improve the control of pollutants.

"(B) RESTRICTIONS.—Subparagraph (A) shall only apply if—

"(i) the amount paid, directly or indirectly, for the facilities does not exceed their fair market value,

"(ii) the fees or charges imposed, directly or indirectly, upon the seller for any use of the facilities after the sale are not less than the amounts that would be charged if the facilities were financed with obligations the interest on which is not exempt from tax, and

(iii) no person other than the qualified regional pollution control authority is considered after the sale as the owner of the facilities for purposes of Federal income taxes.

"(C) QUALIFIED REGIONAL POLLUTION CONTROL AUTHORITY DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'qualified regional pollution control authority' means an authority which—

"(i) is a political subdivision created by State law to control air or water pollution,

(ii) has within its jurisdictional boundaries all or part of at least two counties (or equivalent political subdivisions), and

"(iii) operates air or water pollution control facilities.".

On page 228, line 1, strike out "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(e)".

Mr. TOWERS. Mr. President, this amendment, which has been cleared with the distinguished managers of this bill, addresses two basic problems in the IDB area. This amendment clarifies the availability of tax-exempt financing for the acquisition of certain pollution control facilities by a qualified regional pollution control authority. Under the code, tax-exempt industrial development bonds may be issued to provide pollution control facilities. However, the Internal Revenue Service interprets this provision to be inapplicable where bonds proceeds are to be used to acquire an existing facility, which may then be operated to treat pollutants from one or several companies.

Various facilities may have been installed by one or more companies to control pollution in a particular area. As time passes, however, and as other companies generate pollution, it may become increasingly difficult to maintain the required level of pollution control for the overall area. In such case, a regional pollution control authority may determine that it is necessary to acquire and operate an existing facility in order to maintain or improve the level of pollution control in this area. The authority may achieve this, for example, by controlling the release of water pollutants from several initial treatment facilities and then blending and treating the amounts so released. These operations are as important to overall pollution control as the original construction of the facilities. For this reason, an amendment is needed to make it clear that tax-exempt bonds may be used for the acquisition by a qualified regional pollution control authority of an existing facility in such circumstances.

A qualified regional pollution control authority is defined for this purpose as a political subdivision which has been created by State statute for the purpose of controlling pollution, and which has within its boundaries all or part of at least two counties. Furthermore, the authority must agree, pursuant to a contract or covenant in a bond resolution or bond trust indenture, to operate and maintain the pollution control facility that is to be acquired with the proceeds of the bonds. And, finally, in answer to concerns of the Treasury and the joint committee that the purchase of these existing pollution control facilities from industrial owners might serve merely as a device to refinance the existing facility and pass through the benefits of tax-exempt financing to the industrial owner, the amendment provides that the amount paid for the facilities must reflect their fair market value and the seller may not receive any other compensation for the facilities, directly or indirectly, including any adjustment in fees or charges imposed by the regional authority.

This part of the amendment would apply with respect to bonds issued by a qualified regional pollution control authority after the date of enactment.

The other portion of this amendment expands the definition of "applicable elected representative" to include the highest elected legal officer of the executive branch of a State.

I am pleased to offer this amendment with my distinguished colleague from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) and respectfully urge its adoption.

At this point I should like to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I joint my distinguished colleague from Texas in seeking to remedy a situation that was brought to the attention of Senator TOWER and myself in 1972 by the Gulf Coast Waste Disposal Authority.

For the past 10 years, the gulf coast has sought clarification of the tax regulations under section 103 to permit tax-exempt financing for certain acquisitions of existing pollution control facilities when needed to achieve effective compliance with Federal or State requirements through a regional system of water pollution control.

The authority is a regional instrumentality of the State of Texas created in 1969 by the Texas Legislature to improve water quality and regulate and control pollution from municipal and industrial wastes. To that end it has financed the installation of new water pollution control facilities for various parties. In certain cases, however, the overall treatment and reduction of water pollutants can best be accomplished if an existing pollution control facility can be acquired with tax-exempt financing and operated in a coordinated manner with other control facilities. This would appropriately further the authority's regional regulation of waste discharges to minimize the total amount of polluting of the waters within its jurisdiction.

After these 10 years of attempts to seek an administrative remedy through the Internal Revenue Service, it has become eminently clear that any solution must be legislative. To that end, we have worked with the Finance Committee, the Joint Committee on Taxation, and the Treasury Department in providing a mutually agreed-upon solution represented by this amendment. I am pleased to join my fellow Texan in offering the amendment and I urge its adoption.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TOWER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1142) was agreed to.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, both Senators from Washington have an amendment which I think can be disposed of, and the Senators from Illinois (Mr. DIXON and Mr. PERCY) are cosponsors of the amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1143

(Purpose: Relating to leasing transaction rule)

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I call up an amendment which I have at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is in order.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON), for himself and Mr. PERCY, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. DIXON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1143.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 245, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

(5) Special transition rule for certain aircraft.—For purposes of paragraph (2) and section 168(i)(8) of such Code, in the case of property which is an aircraft—

(A) paragraph (2) and section 168(i)(8)(B) of such Code shall be applied by substituting "January 1, 1984" for "July 1, 1983", and

(B) construction of such aircraft shall be treated as having begun during the period referred to in paragraph (2)(B) and section 168(i)(8)(B)(ii) of such Code, if, during such period—

(i) construction of a subassembly was commenced, or

(ii) the stub wing joiner occurred.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, in an attempt to roughly cut safe harbor leasing in half, has set up definitions pursuant to which construction of a particular commodity—in this case, aircraft—must have taken place between the initial date of safe harbor leasing and February 20 of this year and must be delivered no later than July 1, 1983. In connection with aircraft and several American manufacturers, that is an extremely narrow definition and disqualified almost all of them.

We have come to an agreement to extend that delivery period by 6 months and to precisely define commencement of construction which adds more but far from all aircraft under order at this time.

The amendment is agreed to by the Senator from Kansas, and I recommend its adoption.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I wish to corroborate the statement of my distinguished colleague from Washington.

I believe this amendment is necessary to carry out the original intent of the action taken by the committee.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would like to commend my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON) for his initiative on this important matter.

Many airlines contracted for new aircraft years ago, only to see their financial resources sapped. Aircraft on the order books would have been canceled last year were it not for the passage of safe harbor leasing. If we changed the rules in midstream now, we would be saddling airlines with equipment they would not have kept last year without the leasing law. Such capital-intensive industries cannot buy so-called off-the-shelf equipment. It takes years to build this equipment. The Gorton amendment makes the changes in leasing more equitable and I give it my enthusiastic support.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this amendment has been under discussion for the past several days. I think the Senators from Illinois and Washington did not get what they wanted, but they got about all they could, under the circumstances. I believe that the amendment in its present form is acceptable and should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. DOLE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GORTON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1143) was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JEPSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we have now worked out a rather difficult problem. I think both Senators from Mississippi are satisfied, as are the Senator from Alaska and the Senator from New York. I understand that the distinguished junior Senator from New York will soon be prepared to offer two amendments, both of which have been agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1144

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, the amendment is in order.

The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), for himself and Mr. STENNIS, Mr. WEICKER, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. DENTON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1144.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On line 4, page 274, strike "1985", and insert "September 30, 1987".

On lines 8 and 9, page 274, strike "December 31, 1985," and insert "September 30, 1987".

On page 274, between lines 24 and 25, insert the following:

(e) RESTRICTIONS ON FINANCING CERTAIN FACILITIES.—Paragraph (6) of section 103(b), as amended by subsections (a), (b) and (c), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(i) more than 25 percent of the proceeds of the issue are used to provide a facility the primary purpose of which is one of the following: automobile sales or service, the provision of recreation or entertainment; or

"(ii) any portion of the proceeds of the issue is to be used to provide the following: any private or commercial golf course, country club, massage parlor, tennis club, skating facility (including roller skating, skateboard, and ice skating), racquet sports facility (including handball and racquetball court), hot tub facility, suntan facility, racetrack.

On line 25, page 274, strike out "(e)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

On page 275, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following:

(4) CERTAIN FACILITIES.—The amendment made by subsection (e) shall apply to obligations issued after December 31, 1982.

On page 282, strike out the table between lines 12 and 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In the case of:	The recovery period is:
3-year property	3 years.
5-year property	5 years.
10-year property	10 years.
15-year public utility property.	15 years.

Beginning with line 20, page 282, strike out through line 4, page 283, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "recovery period of 15 years."

On line 12, page 283, insert "sewage or" after "in connection with a".

On line 14, page 283, insert "sewage or" after "which provides".

On line 18, page 283, insert "sewage or" after "all of the".

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, this amendment is a compromise and is a result of rather intensive negotiations and other things. [Laughter.]

I thank the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and Senator LONG. I thank Senator STENNIS, who has been steadfast in his support. I also thank a number of other Senators who have played an instrumental part, including the junior Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADY) and Senator DURENBERGER from Minnesota.

I am pleased to have a number of cosponsors of this amendment, which, I think, strikes a reasonable compromise in retaining industrial revenue bonds through September 30, 1987, and which meets some of the objections by limiting a number of their uses.

Our amendment is designed to protect the vital interests of America's small businesses. Our amendment strikes two provisions included in H.R. 4961, which would make it much more difficult for small businesses to obtain the capital they need to survive in today's marketplace.

The industrial development bond—IDB—program is, and has been, one of the most vital financing options available to small businesses across the Nation. By making necessary capital both affordable and available, IDB's have created tens of thousands of new jobs, allowed thousands of small businesses to thrive and expand and generated substantial additional Federal revenue by increasing both corporate profits and payrolls.

IDB's are a vital tool of economic development. We need the economic stimulus they provide. IDB's are also the essence of federalism. By placing control at the State and local, as opposed to the national level, citizen input is possible and the final decisions are made by those who best know the needs of their own community.

However, despite these numerous and obvious advantages inherent in the program, H.R. 4961 places severe restrictions on IDB usage. Two of these provisions are especially onerous: One denies full A.C.R.S. depreciation benefits to IDB users, the other completely repeals the small-issue IDB program effective December 31, 1985. Section 223 would make those small businesses which obtain low-cost financing with IDB's a different class of taxpayer from all others.

While every other business would be allowed to depreciate its assets using the short-life, accelerated method this Congress adopted last year as part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act, IDB users would have to depreciate their assets over substantially longer lives and would be restricted to using only the straight line method of depreciation. This is inherently unfair. The other provision, subsection c of section 221, would terminate, at the end of 1985, whatever small part of the IDB program still existed after section 223 took effect. This crippling and subsequent killing of IDB's cannot be allowed at this time.

Our amendment makes four changes in H.R. 4961. First, and most importantly, it delays the sunset by 21 months until September 30, 1987. This will give Congress adequate time to carefully study this valuable program and make arrangements for its preservation. Our amendment also greatly lessens the impact of the A.C.R.S. tradeoff contained in H.R. 4961. Although straight line depreciation will still be required, the short depreciable lives—15-10-5-3—embodied in A.C.R.S. will be preserved. Further, our amendment rectifies an oversight of the Finance Committee by exempting sewage facilities, as well as solid waste facilities, from the A.C.R.S. restriction. Finally, our amendment makes great strides in eliminating those well reported abuses in the IDB program. Henceforth, IDB's will not be available to finance automobile dealerships, recreational, and entertainment facilities.

However, we propose no alteration to any of the other sections of H.R. 4961 which deal with IDB's. H.R. 4961, therefore, will still require public hearings before any IDB's could be issued, the written approval of the highest elected official in the local jurisdiction before any IDB's could be issued, the registration of all IDB's, and full reports on IDB usage to the Treasury on a quarterly basis.

The first three of these additional provisions, along with the new facilities exclusions included in our amendment, will go a long way toward eliminating any abuses which may exist in the present IDB program. They will insure the credibility of IDB projects and the accountability of bond transactions. The uniform national reporting system will, for the first time, insure full disclosure of IDB-financed projects and will provide Congress with comprehensive and accurate information on the volume of IDB sales, their purposes, and their impact on the municipal bond market.

Our concern, however, is that the imminent—December 31, 1985—demise of small issue IDB's is irresponsible. This sunset date will allow inadequate time for Congress to assess the data contained in the newly required reports to Treasury. The additional 21 months provided for by our amendment will permit the thorough and energetic review of this vital program which we enthusiastically support.

The loss of A.C.R.S. under the guise of a tradeoff intended to avoid a "double-dip" is inconsistent with the original intent of industrial development bonds and hampers the goals of employment creation, revitalization of depressed local economies, and inducement of investment in productive capital equipment.

The forced tradeoff between IDB financing and A.C.R.S. depreciation benefits would result in the allocation of these bonds to marginally profitable or unprofitable companies since IDB's would then only be attractive to firms that are unaffected by the impact of the loss of A.C.R.S. Thus, we are forced to disagree with what the A.C.R.S. tradeoff provision in H.R. 4961 would do. We do not want to reserve IDB's solely for the use by losing businesses.

Our amendment has a negligible revenue effect in 1983 and reduces the static revenue gain in 1984 and 1985 by $300 million. These figures, however, fail to take account of the well-known "reflow" effects of the IDB program. Every study of IDB's which has taken reflow into account, including one done by former Under Secretary of the Treasury Norman Ture, has shown clearly that IDB's are net revenue raisers for the Federal Treasury. More importantly, given today's economic climate, IDB's generate jobs which would otherwise not have been created.

During the past decade, IDB's have been responsible for the creation or retention of 80,666 jobs in my own State of New York. Similar successes have been recorded in other States. Ture's carefully researched analysis shows undeniably the increases in employment, GNP, and gross private domestic investment, as well as the increases in Federal revenue, that result from IDB usage. Ture concludes that:

> IDB's are productive instruments for promoting economic development by making savings and investment more attractive to individuals and businesses. Their use results in overall gains in capital formation, employment, and output, rather than merely changes in the location of economic activity * * * the resulting expansion of tax bases—individual and corporate income and payroll taxes—generate(s) net gain in tax revenues for the Federal Government and for the State and local governments of the issuing jurisdictions.

A study by Prof. Roger C. Kormendi and Thomas T. Nagle of the University of Chicago echoes the conclusions of Ture. However, they go even further. Not only do they convincingly demonstrate that IDB's result in net gains for the Federal Treasury when reflow is taken into account, they also dispute Treasury's and CBO's static revenue loss estimates. Kormendi and Nagle estimate that a billion dollars of IDB's cost the Treasury no more than $2.7 to $4.3 million without reflow. Thus, even if the entire $10 billion of IDB's which some estimate will be issued next year were eliminated, the static revenue gain would be no more than $27 to $43 million. A.C.R.S. restrictions and the eventual repeal of the small-issue IDB program will not raise revenue for the Federal Government. It will simply cripple America's small business community.

To demonstrate how IDB use generates tax revenue, let me detail one example with which I am intimately familiar—the Nassau and Suffolk County, N.Y., industrial development bond program. As a former presiding supervisor of the town of Hempstead on Long Island, I have been a long time observer and participant in the economic development of my community. IDB's have been one of the most important tools for this development.

In 1980 and 1981, $195,973,000 worth of IDB's were issued in Nassau and Suffolk Counties; 14,055 jobs were created or retained. These jobs generated direct payrolls of $198,139,370, using the conservative estimate that these jobs exist for 10 years, that no raises are granted during that time, and the payrolls are subject to a 20-percent marginal tax rate, the Federal Government will receive $496,078,740 in income tax receipts. This is more than 10 times the $48,993,250 in revenue that Treasury claims that it loses as a result of issuing the volume of bonds that were issued on Long Island during this period.

But this is not all. Another $99,019,684 in State income taxes would be generated during the next 10 years, again using conservative estimates of no raises and a 5-percent marginal tax rate. At least $39,607,874 in State and local sales taxes would be generated when these payrolls were spent. Social security and unemployment taxes add even more to the revenue raised from the issuance of these IDB's.

The capital raised using this IDB financing was used to build 4,631,542 square feet of new structures on Long Island. This will result in additional property tax revenue of at least $69,471,644 over the next 10 years. Finally, all this new business activity results in numerous secondary effects as additional support jobs and economic activity is inspired. That is, IDB use generates a "snowball effect." Thus, to provide revenue loss estimates for the industrial development bond program without taking reflow into account is simply wrong.

There is no reason, therefore, to adopt the A.C.R.S. tradeoff and imminent repeal provisions contained in H.R. 4961. Officials in my State estimate that the A.C.R.S. tradeoff provision alone would result in the curtailment of the New York program by 25 to 50 percent. In other States I have heard of projected cutbacks of as high as 70 percent. We should not now be depriving these small businessmen of needed IDB financing. In contrast, the much less restrictive A.C.R.S. tradeoff provisions contained in our compromise amendment will leave 90 percent of the small issue industrial development bond program intact in my State and elsewhere.

In closing, I should just like to point out that IDB's should be evaluated in light of their original intent which was to "allow communities to provide assistance to small businesses." We should not now renege on that promise. IDB's have become an increasingly important alternative to facilitate the recovery and growth of local communities. They must be preserved.

I believe we have accomplished a happy compromise that many people have sought. I am certain there will be a number of people who could offer additional areas that might be excluded or that might be included. This amendment represents about 17 months of negotiations and other things, as I have indicated. I believe it represents the best thinking of this body. It has the support of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee as well as the Treasury Department.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. D'AMATO. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Does this amendment, as presently drafted, include the exceptions that were in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio in an earlier tax bill and which have been discussed previously with the Senator from New York?

Mr. D'AMATO. It contains all those, with the exception of ski resorts and restaurants.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The restaurants will still be permitted to use the industrial revenue bonds to open McDonald's hamburger joints?

Mr. D'AMATO. That is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, as I understand it, the Senator from New York has proposed two amendments to the bill. Has one been sent to the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only one amendment has been sent to the desk.

Mr. DANFORTH. May I ask the clerk to report the amendment or, in lieu of the clerk reading the amendment, may I ask that it be summarized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By whom? [Laughter.]

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On line 4, page 274, strike "1985", and insert "September 30, 1987".

On lines 8 and 9, page 274, strike "December 31, 1985," and insert "September 30, 1987.

On line 10, page 274, strike "December 31, 1985," and insert "September 30, 1987.

On page 274, between lines 24 and 25, insert the following:

(e) RESTRICTIONS ON FINANCING CERTAIN FACILITIES.—

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, under all the circumstances—and part of the circumstances was that I did not have enough votes—I am happy that this splendid adjustment has been made. It involves some very kind understanding and real statesmanship on the part of the leaders on the bill.

The Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO) has worked diligently on this matter, with a fine understanding.

This is the old program that we are terminating in 1987, which originated in my State almost 50 years ago, right in the middle of the Depression, by a businessman-Governor we had. He conceived the concept of having small villages, little towns, and counties issue these bonds.

And they paid themselves out, so to speak. They were exempt from taxes and, therefore, brought a good price. And it was a marvelous program and still runs and has been kept in bounds and dedicated to the little factory concept and the machinery that goes with it.

I think the whole program fell in bad company, so to speak, by encompassing too many activities and matters that were not really for employment, but the concept of the whole thing was employment for people to make a living, and that is the great purpose that it served.

I just hope that those who represent this adjustment here can prevail and sell it in the conference so as to preserve it and I believe, Mr. President, and I think most every State would be interested in this, that this fine program should be continued and it will be continued under a more restricted form with a better understanding and carried on.

I cannot reconcile the idea with the conditions as they are now with unemployement and we are stopping or providing for the stopping of a program that supplies the very need there of this employment.

But that will be several years in the future before it is actually stopped.

So I am most grateful. I have followed this thing really for many years, and I wish to see it come back into full bloom. I believe it is self-sustaining. After all, it creates the jobs, the people pay the taxes, and that goes in to the Treasurer and I have proof here of illustrations that that fully reimburses the Treasurer for the tax exemptions that went with the bond.

In that way it has been an amazing self-payment proposition.

So that is my recommendation. I hope that it can get a very large vote and be sustained as much as possible, of course, in conference.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment and the second amendment.

I do so being responsive to a number of small communities in my State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Virginia Municipal League and a letter from the office of the city manager, Suffolk, Va., both dated July 13, 1982, in support.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

VIRGINIA MUNICIPAL LEAGUE,
Richmond, Va., July 13, 1982.

Hon. JOHN WARNER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: We urge your opposition to two provisions of the Senate Finance Committee's tax package when it reaches the Senate Floor. These two provisions will increase the cost of long term borrowing for all local governments. The first is the provision which will affect the ability of commercial banks to deduct all of the interest they pay on loans to carry municipal bonds. The second is the provision which will tax tax-exempt municipal bonds when they are held by individuals making over a certain income.

These provisions will exacerbate an already critical problem localities are facing in the bond market as the cost of municipal bonds are beyond the reach of many local governments. We understand that Senator Long may be introducing an amendment to achieve this purpose. Your support of an amendment to delete these two provisions from this tax package will be greatly appreciated.

Thank you for your time and consideration of this important issue.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND RATCLIFF,
Mayor, Pulaski, Va.

CITY OF SUFFOLK, VIRGINIA,
Suffolk, Va., July 13, 1982.

Hon. JOHN W. WARNER, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: It has come to the City of Suffolk's attention that on July 1, 1982, the Senate Finance Committee reported a major tax bill which will adversely affect the municipal bond market. One of the most negative features of the tax bill for local governments is that it would impose a new minimum tax on individuals and corporations that for the first time would tax interest on municipal bonds. In addition, these new taxes would effectively raise municipal interest rates on general obligation, industrial development and mortgage revenue bonds to nearly the same levels as taxable bonds. Thus, the tax exemption for state and local bonds would be virtually eliminated. The City of Suffolk urges your strong opposition to such a measure.

This City, as I am sure is the case with other Virginia localities, has depended on municipal bonds as a vital financing alternative. These bonds have not only provided for needed capital improvements within our community, but have aided in the creation and expansion of commerical activities. Most importantly, municipal bonds have assisted in the development of new employment opportunities for the citizens of Suffolk and have protected current jobs in a time when unemployment has reached extraordinary levels. Without the tax exempt status for state and local bonds, the detrimental effects that would ensue would be disastrous; consequently, we urge you to support deleting state and local bonds from the minimum tax.

The City of Suffolk strongly opposes the Federal Government trying to resolve its financial ills at the expense of local governments by attempting to eliminate one of their most important financial options, the municipal bond market. Again, we respectfully request your support in maintaining the tax exempt status of municipal bonds for local governments.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. ROWE, Jr.,
City Manager.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back my time. I believe I am about out of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield back his time?

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), and the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER), be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment (UP No. 1144) was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. There is another amendment.

Mr. D'AMATO. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. On this one the Senator from Missouri wishes to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may call up an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1145

(Purpose: To remove tax-exempt interest as an item of tax preference for individuals)

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1145.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 194, line 22, strike out "or (13)".

On page 197, line 5, strike out "paragraphs (1) and (13)" and insert in lieu thereof "paragraph (1)".

On page 199, line 24, insert "and" after the comma.

On page 201, line 3, strike out ", and" and insert in lieu thereof a period.

On page 201, strike out lines 4 through 13.

(The names of the following Senators were added as cosponsors of the amendment: Mr. THURMOND, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. DIXON, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. ROTH, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mrs. HAWKINS, and Mr. SPECTER.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, this amendment costs approximately $30 million.

The chairman of the Finance Committee and Senator LONG have agreed that this amendment is one that they will support.

The fact of the matter is that this amendment keeps all tax-exempt bonds tax exempt. They are treated equally. Individuals who purchase industrial bonds and mortgage subsidy bonds will not have to pay an additional premium. I believe that is as it should be.

In order to save time, I will answer any questions concerning my amendment. However this amendment has been the subject of intensive negotiations, and I wish to thank the chairman of the Finance Committee for his indispensable aid in a situation that needs rectifying. Additionally, Senator LONG has helped to bring this amendment to the floor. The passage of this amendment will insure equality of tax treatment with respect to tax exempt bonds. This is as it should be. I urge adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of my committee how much time I might be able to have.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, how much time is remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine minutes to each side.

Mr. DOLE. Five minutes.

Mr. DANFORTH. Five.

Mr. President, I will not be long in stating this. I will only say this, that this minimum tax provision was one of the key reform measures in this bill. It has now been substantially diluted by a deal which contravenes an existing arrangement and I was not part of the discussion.

The issue before us is not the taxation of industrial revenue bonds. The issue before us is whether a handful of wealthy individuals can so arrange their affairs so as to avoid paying any taxes at all.

Without this amendment anyone can buy an industrial revenue bond and have that bond not taxed. That is not the point.

The point is whether an individual who makes hundreds of thousands of dollars can so avail himself of an array of bonds, of tax shelters, of various gimmicks so that he pays nothing at all.

The minimum tax is an alternative tax. It does not apply to the first $40,000 of income at all, and then it is stepped up in two steps and it gets up to a maximum of $20,000. So it is aimed only at very wealthy people who pay none or virtually no taxes at all.

Mr. President, this is a antitax reform, antitax equity amendment. It does not protect the industrial revenue bonds.

Of all the industrial revenue bonds that are sold 75 percent are not even sold to individuals. They are sold to institutions. Of those that are sold to institutions it has been estimated by the Treasury Department that maybe 10 percent are sold to people who would be touched by the minimum tax at all.

So it does not help the industrial revenue bonds. That is a bogus issue. It is an amendment which substantially curtails a major reform measure in this bill.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 1 minute.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, this amendment really guts the minimum tax. We adopted the minimum tax as a reform so that everyone in the United States would pay some tax.

Now we opened a little loophole a little while ago when we adopted the Dodd amendment. Those who bought the municipal general obligation bonds had this loophole they could go through. Now we are widening it to a cavernous opening that would permit all IDB's to qualify and anyone who votes for this in effect is saying the rich can get away with paying no taxes. We have worked it out for you. This is a great big opportunity. We have backed away from our sense of reform that everyone would have to pay something.

I do hope we will reject this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, if I might say I never heard such an overstatement of a amendment that cost only $30 million. Why someone would think this is going to be a great tax loophole is beyond me. My gosh, the Senators know that is not so. We are talking about $30 million in revenues.

If a Senator wants to talk about driving trucks through loopholes then talk about establishing a flat tax system. Let us not go ahead and pander to the public by saying that this is the panacea for the rich. The fact of the matter is that it is not.

I did not come along and suggest we should make the interest on general municipal bonds taxable or not taxable. The Committee on Finance said we should eliminate part of their tax advantage. Then it was decided that the proposal would hurt municipal governments. I suggest that the same logic that says it is going to drive up the costs of municipal governments for general obligation bonds is the same logic that applies in the case of industrial revenue bonds and mortgage subsidy bonds.

I want to tell you something. I resent the idea that someone talks for the rich. I do not talk for the rich. Let us talk about real tax reform. Let us not look at this bill as being a panacea and remedying all the alleged loopholes in the IRS Code. This is not the time to attack programs that create jobs, these are very, very difficult times. This amendment helps create jobs, it is needed and equitable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators MELCHER, DIXON, and KASTEN be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote or change their vote?

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 39, as follows:

So the amendment (UP No. 1145) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1146

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER), for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, and Mr. ANDREWS, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1146.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 537, after line 13 insert

"(C) For purposes of subparagraph (B) an allocation shall be treated as made in good faith if—

(i) made in accordance with Treasury regulations or,

(ii) in the absence of such regulations, made by allocating 7 percent of the gross receipts from each serving period among employees described in this paragraph who worked during such period in proportion to the hours worked by the employee during the serving period. For purposes of the preceding sentence, a serving period is, with respect to any day, a period of not more than 6 hours during which the same menu is offered."

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, this amendment addresses one of the principal problems with the language of section 316—a problem that many of my Minnesota constituents believe will produce an atmosphere of continuing conflict between employees and employers.

Section 316 mandates that when the percentage of gross receipts reported as tips falls below 7 percent, the employer must allocate the difference among his or her employees. On one of two basis:

First, an agreement between employees and employers, or

Second, in the absence of agreement, in the manner determined by such employer in good faith.

The problem is that this language provides absolutely no guidance on what constitutes "a manner determined * * * in good faith." The employer is forced to guess at his peril.

The amendment resolves that problem by creating a statutory standard which will be deemed to constitute a good faith apportionment. That standard is not exclusive;

The amendment expressly authorizes the Treasury to formulate additional regulations defining alternative apportionment mechanisms that will be deemed to constitute good faith.

The parties are still free to negotiate their own alternate system.

This amendment simply provides the parties with some basic guidelines on what will be deemed to constitute good faith guidelines that will protect them while further regulations are being developed.

The amendment is revenue neutral. I move its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think it is a good amendment. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment (UP No. 1146) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request and I am hopeful that I will gain favorable consideration of this request.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes to be evenly divided without this 15 minutes being charged to the bill.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I would like to tell my colleagues that the amendment that is forthcoming, which I am offering with Senator KASTEN and others, is a very complex amendment. We have only, I think, some 13-to-14 minutes remaining.

I am very hopeful that we can acquire some 15 additional minutes to be utilized in the discussion of this amendment and perhaps inclusive of an amendment to be offered by the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS).

It is only 15 additional minutes. We are now in the 20th hour timeframe. I would beseech and hopefully receive the favorable attention and support of my colleagues in this 15-minute request.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in the 8 years I have been here, I have been in many late night sessions. This is the same old story we get involved in. We go through quorum calls not charged to either side all week long. We have quorum calls because Senators are not here to offer amendments. Somehow there is some magic in the middle of the night in getting up and making speeches that nobody is listening to, that the President does not care about, and nobody reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at home.

The issues are well-defined. Somebody wants 15 minutes on this side and then that sparks an argument on that side, and somebody else wants 15 minutes. Until the time has expired, and I might change my mind——

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. I object.

Mr. SARBANES. The quorum calls were charged against the time under the rules.

Mr. GARN. There were quorum calls all week not charged against either side.

Mr. SARBANES. But the quorum calls come out of the 20 hours.

Mr. GARN. There were unanimous-consent agreements all week long where quorum calls were not charged to either side. At this time, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1147

(Purpose: To delete provisions relating to employer reporting with respect to tips)

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration and, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), for himself, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. HEFLIN, and Mr. DIXON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1147.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 535, beginning on line 9, strike all through page 538, line 19.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am going to take a very few moments, because we only have a very few moments, in offering this particular amendment in behalf of myself, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. PRESSLER.

This amendment strikes section 316 of this Finance Committee bill. What is section 316? Many of us know; many of us do not. Frankly, up until 2 days ago, I did not. Since that time I have had the opportunity to talk to a number of people who are in the service business, who are in the restaurant business. I have talked to many people who operate small cafes and restaurants across the State of Arkansas.

Section 316 of the finance bill is a section which literally, I say to my colleagues, deputizes a posse of motel, restaurant, and cafe owners to become a national surveillance squad on waiters' and waitresses' tips. No, it does not only apply, as the title might indicate, to the Marriotts, the Hiltons, or the giant corporations of America. This section applies to any establishment with 10 employees or more. It applies to the mom and pop corner cafe. It applies to Fort Smith, Ark., as we discussed earlier, to Mother's Cafe.

Here is how section 316 works: Any restaurant in this country must take 7 percent of its gross sales and assume that the employees of that restaurant or motel or hotel have earned 7 perent of those gross sales in tips.

For example, an individual establishment takes in $100,000; 7 percent of this is $7,000. Ten employees. This would mean that the restaurant owner would furnish to the IRS a statement saying that John Jones, employee, had earned $700 in tips.

But what about Sue Smith, who is a part-time employee? This legislation does not address that particular problem.

We are creating, Mr. President, a bureaucratic monster. We are putting this monster on the backs of the small businesses of this country, and we are creating, in addition, an adversary relationship between the employer and the employee.

We are, second, driving out businesses by the thousands, small business people who simply do not have the sophistication in their operation to deal with this new burden which section 316 of this bill places upon them.

We pass antipaper legislation, we pass antiregulatory legislation, and then we come back the next month and we pass an additional piece of legislation. We come forward with more crippling legislation in this particular bill that is going not only to intimidate businesses but is going to mean that many small businesses simply cannot comply.

I would like to conclude, Mr. President, by saying that in this particular legislation we are considering tonight, and please if you remember nothing else that I say because my time has gone, we are imposing the possibility of criminal and civil sanctions on every restaurant owner, cafe owner, and motel owner in this country if they do not fairly allocate or estimate the gross earnings among the employees.

This particular section is a monstrous piece of legislation. In fact, I think it is the worst idea for collecting taxes that I have seen since I read the story 3 months ago about how the Internal Revenue Service was going to continue collecting our taxes once the nuclear bomb hit. They have a plan for that.

Mr. President, I will only conclude by saying this, and I apologize, that we are facing 200 bankruptcies a week in this country. If section 316 remains in this legislation, we are going to drive out additional businesses which represent, I think, the best of the free enterprise system.

I yield to a cosponsor, Mr. KASTEN.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, this amendment is identical to the one I intended to offer. I am pleased to join with my friend and colleague Senator PRYOR as an original cosponsor, and I urge my fellow colleagues to join us in deleting section 316 from the bill.

Everyone agrees that taxpayer compliance in reporting tip income is a complex problem. But the tip reporting provisions of this bill were added at the last minute, during committee markup, without hearings, and no one seems to be able to explain how the requirements would work.

The bill states that restaurant and hotel owners or operators must provide the IRS with first, food and beverage sales totals, second, charge sales totals, and third, charge tip totals. The employer must then allocate 7 percent of the gross sales to each of his tipped employees after figuring the proportion of tips they have received.

The bill fails to answer such practical questions as: How do you make an accurate estimate of how much each employee receives in tips? You certainly cannot allocate the same percentage of gross sales to a waiter who served customers during an expensive banquet and to another waiter who worked a breakfast shift during a slow week day. Such factors as number of hours worked, type of shift worked, days of week worked, location of tables, and type of function served must be taken into account. This recordkeeping hassle would be complicated by the fact that many restaurant employees are part time or seasonal and tipping practices vary for different occasions.

What about the tip pooling and splitting arrangements that many waiters, busboys, and bartenders devise for themselves? Many food service workers are never directly tipped, yet they receive a significant portion of their income through these tip sharing arrangements. Under current law, any employee who receives $20 or more a month in tips is a tipped employee. And how does a restaurant owner handle the reporting requirement for the fellow who parks the cars, the hostess, the girl checking coats? This bill would force an employer to keep track of all the tip splitting and pooling transactions that take place in his restaurant every day of the year.

There is a misconception that this proposal is only directed at large restaurants. In fact, a restaurant with as few as 10 employees—that includes dishwashers, cooks, cashiers, and so forth—would have to comply with this tremendous new paperwork burden.

What this provision really does is put the restaurant owner or operator in an adversarial role with his employees. He becomes a kind of in-house IRS agent—checking up on his employees, calculating how much they make and, therefore, how much they owe—and if he does not comply, he faces a Federal penalty.

This incredible new burden on restaurants and hotels across the country—many of which are small, family operated enterprises—is not only ill-conceived, but unnecessary. Under current law, an employee who receives tips in excess of $20 a month must report all such tips in a monthly statement furnished to his employer. The employer must generally take these tips into account in determining the amount of tax to be withheld from the employee's wages. Employers are also required to retain charge receipts and employee tip statements to facilitate IRS audits. The way to solve the tip problem is to target larger establishments and conduct extended audits, using information which already exists.

It is difficult to justify a provision which would force small businesses to do the job the IRS should be doing itself. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting against this unworkable and costly provision by voting to strike section 316 from the bill.

Mr. PRYOR. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I call to the attention of my colleagues the tip-reporting provision of the tax bill we are now considering.

While a fair and equitable method of taxing tips is everyone's objective, the proposals contained in the tax bill before us will not accomplish this goal.

Employers with 10 or more employees would be required to furnish the IRS each employee's share of tip income of an amount equal to 7-percent of gross sales. The 7 percent amount would be allocated among tipped employees in proportion to their respective shares of all tips received by the employees of the establishment. The exact allocation for each employee would be made by either a mutual agreement of the employer and the employees or, in the absence of an agreement, by the determination of the employer.

Mr. President, it would be virtually impossible for an employer to fairly allocate a percentage of gross sales to an employee as tips. In the restaurant business, for example, some waiters and waitresses deal in a higher volume of sales than others. This is true of employees in most businesses, but "salesmanship" in the restaurant business is largely contingent on factors beyond the employee's control, such as hours worked, days of the week worked, type of work shift, table location, and types of dining occasions.

In order to be fair to all employees, Mr. President, an employer would have to consider a wide range of variables which are too elusive to judge with any degree of accuracy. In short, this provision would compel an employer to attribute income to his employees with little knowledge regarding the truth of his statement.

The other major objection I have to this approach on tips is that, at a time when we hear so much about cutting back on regulation of business, we should not by new legislation create an onerous burden on business. The workload and recordkeeping required by this tip-reporting provision would, Mr. President, impose an undue imposition on the affected industries.

The final result can only be increased costs, and a rise in overhead means consumers will be paying more for their meals and other expenses. Increased prices in this period of economic recession do not make sense, particularly when many of our restaurants and related businesses are closing their doors.

Taxes on tips may need attention, Mr. President, but, unfortunately, the provision before us is not the answer.

Mr. President, I support the position taken by my colleagues, the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Wisconsin.

As this evening closes, I think we ought to look at the bill we are voting on. This is the bill, this big book. The pages in question are four pages in this piece of legislation which says that this particular section will apply to large food or beverage establishments in the country. Then it defines further down as follows what is a large food or beverage establishment. Any restaurant which normally employs more than 10 employees on a typical business day.

I can tell you, Mr. President, that that applies to almost every mom and pop restaurant in America. This legislation further says that it shall be up to the employee and the employer to agree upon the percentage of the tips that each of the employees earns. But in the event that there is a disagreement, I want to read what the bill says. It says:

> In the absence of an agreement under subparagraph (a), the determination shall be made by the employer.

So, if an employer had a disagreement with one of his employees, it would be within the power of the employer to determine the amount of tips that the employee had earned.

Mr. President, I thought that this session of the Congress was devoted to taking the Government out of the business houses of America. I have never seen a piece of legislation in my entire career in the practice of law that did more to put Government into the individual small business house in America than section 316 of this bill. I certainly support the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the explanation indicates that the employers will continue to withhold only on amounts reported to them by their tipped employees. Would that not open up the possibility that the next step now would be a requirement that the employees withhold on the basis of that 7 percent, which is already used for computation purpose?

Mr. PRYOR. It is very conceivable, according to some people who have looked at this legislation, that we might possibly collect less tax because of the very problem that the Senator from Nevada has mentioned. I appreciate the question.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. I ask unanimous consent to add Senator ZORINSKY also, of Nebraska, as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I support the amendment striking the tipping provision from the tax bill.

As chairman of the Business, Trade and Tourism Subcommittee of the Commerce Committee, I am cosponsoring this amendment because I am very concerned over the effects that the tipping provision would have on the tourism industry.

Senator INOUYE very rightly called this provision an administratve nightmare. The burden that would be placed on the tourism industry is simply too large.

Tourism is the second most important industry in my home State of South Dakota. In fact, even during these difficult economic times, South Dakota's tourism industry is having a good year.

Most of the fine businesses that bring visitors to South Dakota, and keep them coming back, are small businesses. These are the businesses that the IRS wants to burden.

In addition, it is important to note that the employees of these small South Dakota businesses are not highly paid. In fact, the vast majority of then make less than the minimum wage.

I think that the Treasury Department's contention that these low-paid workers are cheating the Government out of billions of dollars cannot be substantiated. To my knowledge, the IRS has no concrete figures to back up their claims.

If we want to increase taxpayer compliance, that is a commendable goal. However, we must do it in a fair and equitable manner. We should not single out one group of tipped employees, ignoring the doormen, bellhops, barbers, and so forth, who are also tipped employees. We must not strangle our small businesses with unnecessary redtape.

For these reasons, I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting the amendment to strike the tipping provision.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the provision of the Finance Committee bill that was read by the Senator from Illinois has already been changed by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The 7-percent estimated tip rate would provide only a 50-percent compliance rate in many fancy restaurants. It is less than the tip rates that prevail in any region of the country.

Mr. President, this is a $2 billion amendment. That is, it reduces the revenue from the bill by $2 billion. As everyone in this room knows, we do relatively little to improve compliance. The present tip compliance rate for tips is about 14 percent, a little higher than drug dealers and others who engage in other illegal activities.

Let us be fair about it. A lot of people work in restaurants and hotels and have their taxes withheld from wages. They pay their taxes. All we are trying to do is bring a little uniformity into taxpayer compliance patterns. We have told the unions and told the restaurants we are going to try to work any technical problems out in conference. We have tried to persuade others of that.

I yield briefly to the Senator from Missouri, who has a very telling letter on this subject.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Elms Hotel in Excelsior Springs, Mo., is historic in that that was where Harry Truman spent his election night in 1948. The general manager of the hotel wrote me as follows in April about the Taxpayer Compliance Improvement Act, which was much stiffer than what is in the bill before us. He said:

THE ELMS,
Excelsior Springs, Mo., April 16, 1982.

Senator JOHN C. DANFORTH,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DANFORTH: I just read your letter to Mr. Charles L. Jones, Executive Vice-President of Missouri's Hotel and Motel Association. I support the provisions of S. 2198 (Taxpayer Compliance Improvement Act of 1982) which would require employers to report charged tips paid to employees. My position is in direct opposition to the American Hotel and Motel Association of which I am a member. I feel that everyone employed should pay their fair share of taxes and I further believe that far less than 20 percent of tip income is reported on income tax returns.

I have discussed this issue with my bookkeeper and he assures me that S. 2198 would only increase his work effort 10 minutes daily. As a matter of fact we have been withholding taxes on charged tips for two months now. We also require our employees to record their cash tips on the back of their time cards and we withhold taxes on these tips.

Just thought you would like to know that some people in the hotel industry support your stand on this issue.

Sincerely,

KENNETH D. BELL,
General Manager.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. I am not managing the time and I am a little hesitant to use up Senator DOLE's time, since it is so limited.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I can ask the question of anybody. The letter is a very magnanimous letter on Mr. Bell's part. But I notice he mentioned charged tips all the way through here. The thing Senator PRYOR is trying to get at does not deal with charged tips. I do not think anybody is questioning that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is all time expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, may I make a request before that motion is made?

Mr. BAKER. Surely.

Mr. PRYOR. I would like to sincerely plead with the majority leader and the manager of the bill that this particular amendment not be tabled. I know I am asking a lot, but I know this amendment affects literally millions of people. I think it is one we need a clear-cut decision on. I am making that request respectfully to the majority leader, to have an up-or-down vote and not a tabling motion.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not have any preference. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. I appreciate that response.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, on this vote I have a pair with the distinguished Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE). If he were present and voting, he would vote "aye." I have already voted "nay." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 25, as follows:

So Mr. PRYOR's amendment (UP No. 1147) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York wants to offer an amendment, and I guess he wants a voice vote.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1148

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself; Mr. BAKER, the majority leader; and Mr. MATSUNAGA, I send to the desk an amendment which would modify the provision in the bill before the Senate having to do with section 936, which contains the tax provisions for Puerto Rico and other possessions of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York, for himself and Mr. BAKER, and Mr. MATSUNAGA, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1148.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

1. On page 261, change line 14 by inserting a period after the word "property," and by striking lines 15 through 22.

2. On page 266, add the following after line 16:

"(5) ELECTION OUT.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The rules contained in paragraphs (1) through (4) do not apply for any taxable year if an election pursuant to subparagraph (D) is in effect to use one of the methods specified in subparagraph (C).

(B) ELIGIBILITY.—

(i) REQUIREMENT OF SIGNIFICANT BUSINESS PRESENCE.—An election may be made to use one of the methods specified in subparagraph (C) only if an electing corporation has a significant business presence in a possession. In addition, an election may remain in effect for any subsequent taxable year only if such electing corporation maintains a significant business presence in a possession. If an election is not in effect for a taxable year because of the peceding sentence, the electing corporation shall be deemed to have revoked the election.

(ii) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this subparagraph, an electing corporation has a "significant business presence" in a possession if

(I) the total conversion expenses incurred by the electing corporation in the possession in producing products, or rendering services, including compensation for labor, depreciation, and other allocable direct or indirect expenses as provided by regulations, are not less than 25 percent of the difference between (a) the gross receipts from services performed for unrelated persons, or from sales by the affiliated group to unrelated persons of the product produced, in whole or in part, by the electing corporation in the possession, and (b) the cost of materials purchased from unrelated persons, or

(II) substantially all of the manufacturing activity connected with a product is conducted in the possession, but the electing corporation still fails to meet the test specified in subparagraph (B)(ii)(I).

An electing corporation must satisfy either test separately with respect to each product area in which the electing corporation conducts its activities, and an election may be made only with respect to services or products within those product areas for which the significant business presence test is satisfied.

(iii) SPECIAL RULES.—An electing corporation which produces products or renders services in a possession on [date of enactment] must meet the significant business presence test in a possession for its first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1985. The Secretary shall prescribe regulations setting forth an appropriate significant business presence test for start-up years of other electing corporations, for the implementation of the test specified in subparagraph (B)(ii)(I) in cases where the product produced by the electing corporation does not have an independent resale price, and for other appropriate cases in a manner consistent with the tests specified in subparagraph (B)(ii).

(C) METHODS OF COMPUTATION OF TAXABLE INCOME.—If an election of one of the following methods is in effect pursuant to subparagraph (F), an electing corporation shall compute its income in accordance with whichever method is elected.

(i) COST SHARING.—

(I) AMOUNT OF COST SHARING.—If an election of this method is in effect, the electing corporation must bear a share of the amount of product area research for that taxable year which is incurred by the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member. Such share shall not be less than the same proportion of such product area research which the amount of "possession sales" bears to the amount of "total sales" of the affiliated group. The amount of product area research incurred solely by the electing corporation in a taxable year (including amounts paid under any bona fide cost sharing agreements with unrelated persons) will be offset against the amount of the electing corporation's cost sharing under this method for that year.

(a) PRODUCT AREA RESEARCH.—For purposes of this section, the term "product area research" includes (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary) the research, development and experimental costs, losses, expenses and other related deductions (including amounts incurred for the acquisition of research or similar items, or for the performance of research or similar activities by another person, and qualified research expenses within the meaning of section 44F(b)) which are properly apportioned or allocated to, and a ratable part of any such costs, losses, expenses, or other deductions which cannot definitely be allocated to, the same product area as that in which the electing corporation conducts its activities.

(b) AFFILIATED GROUP.—For purposes of this subsection, the term "affiliated group" shall be defined with reference to section 482.

(c) POSSESSION SALES.—For purposes of this section, the term "possession sales" means the sales for the year by members of the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member of products produced, in whole or in part, by the electing corporation in the possession which are in the same product area as is used for determining the amount of product area research, and of services rendered in the possession in such product area to unrelated persons.

(d) TOTAL SALES.—For purposes of this section, the term "total sales" means the total sales for the year by members of the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member of all products in the same product area as is used for determining the amount of product area research, and of services rendered in such product area, to unrelated persons.

(e) PRODUCT AREA.—For purposes of this section, the term "product area" shall be defined by reference to the three-digit classification of the Standard Industrial Classification code. The Secretary may provide for the aggregation of two or more three-digit classifications where appropriate, and for a classification system other than the Standard Industrial Classification code in appropriate cases.

(II) EFFECT OF ELECTION.—Solely for purposes of determining the amount of its gross income for a taxable year, if an election of this method is in effect, the electing corporation shall be treated as the owner (for purposes of obtaining a return thereon) of intangible property described in subsection (h)(3)(B)(i) which has been transferred to such electing corporation pursuant to applicable legal requirements and which is related to the products produced by the electing corporation. Such electing corporation shall not be treated as the owner (for purposes of obtaining a return thereon) of any intangible property described in subsection (h)(3)(B)(ii) through (v) or similar items. Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, an electing corporation shall be treated as the owner (for purposes of obtaining a return thereon) of intangible property which was developed and is owned solely by such corporation in a possession, intangible property described in subsection (h)(3)(B)(i) acquired from unrelated persons, and any intangible property described in subsection (h)(3)(B)(ii) through (v) or similar items which relate to sales of products or services rendered to unrelated persons for ultimate consumption in the possession in which the electing corporation conducts its trade or business.

(iii) SPECIAL RULES.—

(a) The amount of the cost sharing determined under subparagraph (C)(i)(I) shall reduce the amount of the deductions otherwise allowable to the appropriate domestic member or members (other than an electing corporation) of the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member, or, if there are no such domestic members, to a foreign member of such affiliated group as the Secretary may provide under regulations.

(b) An electing corporation computing its taxable income under this method shall not be denied use of the resale price method for purposes of inter-company pricing under section 482 merely because the reseller adds more than an insubstantial amount to the value of the product by the use of intangible property.

(c) The amount of qualified research expenses, within the meaning of section 44F, of any member of the controlled group of corporations (as defined in section 44F(f)) of which the electing corporation is a member shall not be affected by the amount of cost sharing required under this method.

(ii) PROFIT SPLIT.—

(I) GENERAL RULE.—If an election of this method is in effect, the electing corporation's taxable income shall be equal to 50 percent of the combined taxable income of the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member derived as a result of the sale by the affiliated group to unrelated persons or foreign affiliates of products produced or services rendered, in whole or in part, by the electing corporation in a possession.

(II) COMPUTATION OF COMBINED TAXABLE INCOME.—Combined taxable income shall be computed separately for each product produced or type of service rendered, in whole or in part, by the electing corporation in a possession. Combined taxable income shall be computed (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary) by deducting all expenses, losses, and other deductions properly apportioned or allocated to such sales, and a ratable part of all expenses, losses, or other deductions which cannot definitely be allocated thereto, which are incurred by the affiliated group. In computing the combined taxable income, the amount of the share of product area research described in subparagraph (C)(i) shall be taken as a deduction instead of the actual amount of research, development, and experimental costs, expenses, and related deductions for the taxable year which would otherwise be deductible.

(III) DIVISION OF COMBINED TAXABLE INCOME.—The electing corporation shall be entitled to 50 percent of the combined taxable income computed in the manner provided in subparagraph (C)(ii)(II). The remainder of the combined taxable income, computed without regard to the last sentence of subparagraph (C)(ii)(II), shall be allocated to the appropriate domestic member or members (other than an electing corporation) of the affiliated group of which the electing corporation is a member, or, if there are no such domestic members, to a foreign member of such affiliated group as the Secretary may provide under regulations.

(D) UNRELATED PERSON.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term "unrelated person" means any person other than a person related within the meaning of paragraph (3)(D) to the electing corporation.

(E) ELECTING CORPORATION.—For purposes of this subsection, the term "electing corporation" shall mean a domestic corporation for which an election under this section is in effect.

(F) WHEN AND HOW MADE.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—An election under subparagraph (A) to use one of the methods under subparagraph (C) shall be made with the tax return of the electing corporation for the first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1982. If an election of one of such methods is made, such method must be used for each taxable year thereafter until such election is revoked by the electing corporation under subparagraph (F)(iii). If any such election is revoked by the electing corporation under subparagraph (F)(iii), such electing corporation may make a subsequent election under subparagraph (A) only with the consent of the Secretary.

(ii) MANNER OF MAKING ELECTION.—An election under subparagraph (A) to use one of the methods under subparagraph (C) may be made in such a manner as the Secretary shall prescribe by regulations.

(iii) REVOCATIONS.—An election may be revoked for any taxable year—

(I) beginning before the expiration of the year described in subsection (e)(2)(A) only with the consent of the Secretary, and

(II) beginning after the expiration of the year described in subsection (e)(2)(B) without the consent of the Secretary.

(iv) AGGREGATION.—All electing corporations in the same affiliated group producing products in the same product area must elect to compute their taxable income under the same method. In addition, all members of such affiliated group must consent to an election.

(G) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this subsection.

3. On page 271, add the following after line 11:

"(4) ELECTION OUT.—The rules contained in section 936(h)(5) shall be applicable to a domestic corporation which is described in subsection (e)(1)(A). For purposes of applying section 936(h)(5) to such a corporation, the words "Virgin Islands" shall be subsituted for the word "possession."

4. On page 259:

a. On line 2, strike "90" and insert "65".

b. Amend line 20 to read as follows:

be substituted for "65 percent":

"For taxable years beginning in calendar year:	The percentage is:
1983	55
1984	60.".

5. On page 266, line 22 strike "90" and insert "65".

6. On page 271, amend line 15 to read as follows:

age shall be substituted for "65 percent":

"For taxable years beginning in calendar year:	The percentage is:
1983	55
1984	60.".

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of Mr. STEVENS be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, may we have order?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have assured the Senator from New York and the Senator from Tennessee that we are going to do the best we can for Puerto Rico in the conference. They have a real problem, and I pledge to do the best we can. I hope we defeat this amendment on a voice vote. I know that Senator LONG and other conferees are concerned about this, and I think we can probably work it out.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the chairman of the Finance Committee has repeated his concern in this matter before, and we take it with absolute confidence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (UP No. 1148) was rejected.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1149

(Purpose: Modifying the lessor and lessee caps for safe-harbor leasing)

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), for himself and Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. EAGLETON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1149.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment to dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 229, line 16, strike out "by more than 50 percent".

On page 229, lines 22 and 23, strike out "by more than 52 percent".

On page 229, beginning with line 24, strike out all through page 230, line 17.

On page 235, beginning with "but" on line 9, strike out all through page 236, line 14, and insert in lieu thereof a period.

On page 241, line 15, strike out "45" and insert in lieu thereof "0".

On page 241, line 16, strike out "40" and insert in lieu thereof "0".

On page 243, beginning with ", but" on line 7 strike out all through "property" on page 243, line 11

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this amendment is a grand opportunity to make up the revenue we lost on the last amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unfortunately, the Senator is out of order. All time has expired.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the majority leader, and ask for 10 minutes on the amendment, to be equally divided.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we might have 10 minutes, equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand how Senators feel about this. It is very late. But I hope we will provide some time for debate on this amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that there be 8 minutes, equally divided, for debate on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask if there are any other amendments that are going to be called up.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there is an amendment by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, an amendment by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, perhaps one by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, and one by the Senator from Colorado. Some of these will take about 1 minute. There is one by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Kansas will have to have enough to pick up $3 billion.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I renew my request. I ask unanimous consent that there be 8 minutes—4 minutes to a side—on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Reserving the right to object, are there time agreements on the other amendments, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Can we obtain time agreements on the other amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be up to the majority leader and the will of the Senate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I modify the request to be 4 minutes, equally divided, 2 minutes on a side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators BUMPERS, ARMSTRONG, EAGLETON, and SASSER, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

THE AMENDMENT

Mr. President, our amendment would repeal safe harbor leasing. Our amendment would end the trading of tax benefits as of July 1, 1982. Our amendment does not change the transition rules in the committee bill. Nor does it affect the special provisions provided for mass transit.

Our amendment would raise an additional $2.2 billion between 1983 and 1985—$0.3 billion in 1983, $0.7 billion in 1984, and $1.2 billion in 1985. Earlier JTC estimates show an even greater revenue effect: $5.6 billion over the next 3 years. But much more than revenue is at stake here. Much more. What is at stake is public trust in the tax system and, hence, in the ability of Government itself to govern fairly and justly.

INTRODUCTION

Anyone who has read a newspaper this month knows that these are the times of taxpayer disgust. To an overwhelming majority of Americans the Tax Code is too complex. It is impossible to understand.

Mr. President, none of us should be surprised that Americans increasingly perceive our tax laws as unfair.

The Tax Code is littered with a hodgepodge of subsidies, loopholes, deductions, credits, and misguided trickle-down economic programs.

From a total of 50 in 1967, tax loopholes—or tax expenditures or preferences, as they are sometimes called—now number 104. From $36 billion in 1967, tax loopholes now cost $270 billion—an increase of 750 percent. Left untouched, these tax loopholes are estimated to cost $450 billion in 1987.

Tax loopholes now equal nearly one-third of the Federal budget.

Who benefits from these loopholes or tax expenditures?

The 3 out of 10 Americans who itemize there tax returns.

The popularity of flat tax is proof that Americans are fed up with the Tax Code. They think it is unfair. And they think the rich are using it to get richer, while the average taxpayer gets poorer.

Tax leasing is just one of the exemptions, credits, and deductions that fill the Tax Code. But it has become symbolic of the code's unfairness.

Our tax system is akin to a time bomb ready to explode and safe harbor leasing is its fuse.

We can act today—not in 1985—to dampen that fuse.

We can act today—not in 1985—to restore some public confidence in the fairness of our tax laws.

We can act today—not in 1985—to reduce the deficit further and to thereby lower interest rates.

We can act by repealing outright one of the most outrageous tax loopholes ever devised.

WHAT IS SAFE HARBOR LEASING

Safe harbor leasing was little more than a footnote to the so-called Economic Recovery Tax Act (ERTA). But it has become the symbol of a tax loophole gone wild.

Safe harbor leasing is not leasing at all. It merely is a way for corporations to buy and sell unused tax credits and deductions. Technically, it permits a firm with little or no tax liability to finance its purchase of property by calling the financing arrangement a lease. The resulting sale transfers two tax breaks to the paper lessor: The first is an investment tax credit that represents a direct subsidy from other taxpayers. The second is a rapid tax depreciation which creates an interest-free loan from the Treasury.

Trading tax benefits, via leasing, gives profitable corporations who would otherwise pay their fair share of income taxes total relief from such tax liability. For example, one highly profitable company—General Electric—collected a $150 million refund from the Treasury for past year's taxes thanks to safe harbor leasing. And without leasing, GE would have paid $250 million in taxes.

Tax leasing is, in reality, a gimmick. It provides an artificial means of transferring the benefits of artificial depreciation—and artificial revenue.

This is the first opportunity to change safe harbor leasing. The Finance Committee recognized that there are problems. But its bill only goes part way toward correcting the situation.

THE FINANCE COMMITTEE BILL

The committee bill limits the ACRS and interest deductions and the investment credits that may be claimed by the lessor; limits the amount of the lessee's property that may be leased; limits the amount that the lessor may reduce its tax liability through safe harbor leasing; and limits the length of the lease term. The Finance Committee bill severely restricts the use of tax leasing by profitable companies and eliminates its use by multinational corporations. Finally, the Finance Committee bill sunsets leasing in 1985.

But the Finance Committee bill does not go far enough soon enough. That is why I am proposing complete repeal.

TAX LEASING IS INEFFICIENT

Safe harbor leasing permits transactions only to avoid taxes.

That is outrageously inefficient.

The function of a safe harbor lease is to sell tax benefits that cannot be used by one company to another company that has a tax liability. Such a transaction involves hordes of attorneys, accountants, and financial magicians.

According to a Joint Tax Committee staff analysis, nearly $140 million in fees—or 2 percent of the transaction benefits—went to the third parties who arranged leases prior to February 20, 1982. According to the same analysis, the "efficiency" of safe harbor leasing transactions was about 75 percent. In other words, the amounts received by the seller/lessees—who where the intended beneficiaries—was 25 percent less than if they had received a direct check from the Treasury.

Safe harbor leasing is inefficient in another way. It misallocates scarce capital. While the intended beneficiaries of leasing are large capital-intensive companies that are in trouble, tax leasing also subsidizes large capital-intensive companies which are not in trouble. In fact, it also benefits large, profitable companies that are not in trouble and that are not capital-intensive.

Mr. President, it has never been thought necessary to guarantee a business that it will not suffer a true economic loss. yet, safe harbor leasing does exactly that.

LEASING AND SMALL BUSINESS

Those who feast at the table of tax-break sales are mostly large industrial corporations. A few scraps can find their way to small businesses, but the scraps are hardly worth the cost of the meal.

The cost of the meal is an increased Federal deficit, which increases the Government's need to compete for credit. That, in turn, adds pressure to keep interest rates high and to make it more difficult for small businesses to get credit.

Mr. President, safe harbor leasing has failed miserably to help small business. Yet small firms—now experiencing record bankruptcies—are the traditional backbone of the American economy. Small businesses produce 8 out of 10 new jobs, 35 percent of GNP, and most of the technology innovations that benefit all of us.

Mr. President, repeal of safe harbor leasing is strongly supported by the National Federation of Independent Businesses. This is further supported by the American Business Conference who represent medium-size high-growth companies. They have stated that leasing inhibits the flow of capital from dwindling industries to high-growth efficient businesses. There is no better testimony, I submit, to the effect of leasing on small businesses than their endorsement of repeal.

CONCLUSION

As we consider revenue measures that will eventually touch every American, I ask my colleagues support in the interest of equity and fairness to end tax benefit trading.

Arguments in support of leasing are extremely weak. The companies who have lobbied hardest for leasing want to retain these subsidies to offset poor business decisions made before enactment of safe harbor. For example, nearly all of the aircraft currently being subsidized by leasing were ordered before 1981. The aircraft industry is suffering from excessive capacity brought about by poor business decisions made after the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978. We can not unfairly bail out these companies with tax subsidies while letting the free market system decide the business fortunes of others.

If we intend to move toward more fairness in the tax system, subsidies like leasing must be repealed. If we intend to encourage American business and specifically small business, the record budget deficits which are contributing significantly to the sustained high interest rates choking the American economy must be reduced.

Capital is scarce and expensive. Safe-harbor leasing does nothing to help while increasing the Treasury's demand for borrowed capital.

It is incredulous to expect average taxpayers to comply with our voluntary tax system when they see large corporations trading tax benefits. I believe Amercian taxpayers find this activity repugnant. I know I do.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment to end safe harbor leasing.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the amendment that would repeal the safe harbor leasing provisions enacted in 1981. This provision of the Economic Recovery Tax Act has been an effective means for some of the industries hardest hit by this severe recession—steel, mining, automobiles—to raise badly needed capital.

My concern is for the future economic health of those basic industries, which employ many thousands of West Virginians. For industries that are laying off workers, cutting production dramatically, and closing plants, the safe harbor leasing provisions are essential. Without some form of safe harbor leasing, the industries that I have mentioned would be largely unable to utilize the tax incentives contained in the 1981 law. These incentives include the investment tax credit and the accelerated cost recovery system. The fundamental purposes of such incentives is to help create broad-based growth opportunities in our economy and to serve as a stimulus for the creation of jobs. In short, these are provisions designed to increase the productivity of our industries.

It is a matter of equity that the productivity-oriented tax reductions be available to all industries, not just a lucky few. The safe harbor leasing provisions help assure that the economic incentives in the 1981 tax law are available to a broad range of American's industrial firms.

The mining industry and the steel industry have both used the safe harbor leasing provisions extensively. These industries both require enormous amounts of capital investment to create new facilities or to modernize existing plant and equipment. At the same time, both industries have been devastated by sustained high interest rates—a condition which has made borrowing to satisfy their capital needs prohibitively expensive. The result has been large-scale layoffs and plant and mine closings.

For the steel and mining industries, safe harbor leasing represents an innovative means of capital formation. It represents a chance to raise capital to modernize facilities. Most important, it provides a jobs-financing mechanism for these industries. For the thousands of miners and steelworkers who are laid off right now in West Virginia, repeal of this provision would be a step in the wrong direction.

The bill reported by the Finance Committee is likely to be a negative force on capital formation in our economy. To avoid making this bill an even bigger drag on the economy, I urge my colleagues to reject the amendment.

REPEAL SAFE HARBOR LEASING

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Bumpers-Baucus-Armstrong amendment to repeal the safe harbor leasing provisions of Economic Recovery Tax Act which was passed last year. These provisions, which have been surrounded by controversy since their inclusion in the tax bill, allow corporations with unused tax breaks to, in effect, sell them to other businesses that can use them.

Almost half of American companies have no taxable income though most of these are profitable. They pay no tax as a result of existing tax credits and deductions. Leasing was added to last year's bill by the administration when it became concerned that these businesses would have no incentive to increase their capital spending even given the bill's generous accelerated depreciation provisions.

Conservation estimates of the cost of this provision run to some $29 billion over the next 5 years.

Now, it is well and good to offer incentives to business to encourage their expansion. It is especially wise to offer incentives to the productive and efficient small businesses of this Nation to encourage their critical role as job creator and innovator. I supported last year's tax bill in part because it contained certain small business tax breaks that I felt were greatly needed.

I question, however, the retention of the costly leasing provision at a time when we are faced with projections of record, $100 billion plus, budget deficits. The risks posed by such deficits, and their effect on interest rates are too great.

In addition, the use of leasing by giant corporations making tremendous profits calls the equity of our tax structure into question. For example, Occidental, a profitable oil company, recently sold the tax benefits of some $95 million in investments. Because Occidental showed losses on its U.S. operations it was unable to use these tax breaks even though it made millions in profits on its foreign operations.

At a time when the taxes of hard-working individuals are characterized by steady increases, it is not fair to allow billion dollar businesses to reap such tax windfalls as the safe harbor leasing provisions allow.

It is also not fair to allow big firm benefits while small firms, already disproportinately burdened by high-interest rates and a stagnant economy, are effectively excluded. According to a story in the February 8, 1982, Wall Street Journal: "Small businesses don't get anywhere near the tax benefits big companies receive from the safe harbor leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981."

Mr. President, small business constituents of mine tell me that for the most part they cannot take advantage of leasing. In fact, the law specifically prohibits small, closely held corporations from taking advantage of leasing by operation of the at-risk rules.

And every one of the small business people that I have talked to about leasing raised the problem of its impact of budget deficits.

When you are forced to pay 2 or 3 points over the prime interest rate for your operating capital, you quickly learn about those things that have an impact on interest rates. And budget deficits are among those things that affect the interest rates a small business pays.

There is simply no place for multi-million-dollar tax breaks to multibillion-dollar profitable corporations at a time of record deficits, record interest rates, and record small business failures.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this amendment.

Also, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter and factsheet sent to me by Mike McKevitt, director of Federal legislation for the National Federation of Independent Business, which is opposed to tax leasing, be inserted into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Washington, D.C. April 22, 1982.

Hon. JAMES R. SASSER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JIM: NFIB member firms support repeal of the safe harbor leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. These provisions not only discriminate against smaller, non-capital intensive firms, but the vast majority of the small business community has been purposefully prevented from using them by IRS regulations. In a February, 1982 poll of our 520,000 small business owner-members, NFIB discovered that 63% of the firms polled thought these tax breaks for unprofitable businesses should be repealed only, 27% favored retaining them, while 10% were undecided.

In a period of huge federal budget deficits and devastatingly high interest rates it is disingenuous in the extreme to argue that the safe harbor leasing provisions of the ERTA hold the key to economic recovery. Of immensely greater importance, to a much large segment of the business community, would be dramatically reducing proposed deficit levels, allowing interest rates to come down, while keeping the lid on inflation.

Just as with many of our nation's well intentioned social welfare programs, this business welfare program is too expensive and, in fact, counterproductive. Take the money for this big business give-away and reduce the deficit—your main street small business owners will thank you.

I've enclosed a short analysis for you on this issue, if I can provide you with further information don't hesitate to call me.

Sincerely,

JAMES D. "MIKE" MCKEVITT,
Director, Federal Legislation.

Enclosure.

SMALL BUSINESS AND SAFE HARBOR LEASING

The safe harbor leasing section of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA) has caused extensive debate and concern over its economic impact. Insofar as small business is concerned the debate has centered around whether the economic benefits of leasing are being distributed evenly within the business community.

The practice of leasing equipment or the sale and leaseback of equipment has been enjoyed by businesses for some time. Through its rulings, IRS has maintained several tight restrictions on such deals to insure that there is an economic justification to the transaction and to insure that the motives for entering into the lease were not primarily the reduction of tax liability. The safe harbor leasing section in ERTA removed these IRS rules, allowing firms, in most cases, to buy or sell investment tax credits and depreciation deductions openly to insure the lowest tax liability to the buyer and seller.

ERTA's safe harbor leasing provisions did, however, impose certain restrictions to prevent the tax benefits from being transferred to individuals. The practical effect of this was to exclude most small businesses from being lessors, or buyers, of the tax credits. The restrictions state that a lessor must be a corporation, other than a subchapter S corporation or a closely held corporation, and must have a minimum at risk investment in the equipment. The majority of small firms are not corporations, and those that are mostly fall into the category of closely held corporations. Therefore, the restrictions generally preclude small firms from such investment transactions.

It is on the lessee's, or seller's side that what benefits there are to small firms seem to have been provided. Small firms, in fact any firm, can sell its unusable tax credits and depreciation deductions if it can find a buyer, negotiate the legal and tax aspects of the transaction, afford the legal and accounting fees, and lastly, even afford to purchase equipment in the first place. To even the casual observer, the legal and technical obstacles would seem somewhat beyond the scope and capabilities of an average small business owner.

However, notwithstanding the difficulties involved in arranging a lease transaction, some small firms might be able to recognize benefits from utilizing the safe harbor leasing rules, especially if they are new firms or are unprofitable in the year of the investment. For new firms, the reason is that such firms usually have no taxable profits in early years, forcing them to carry over net operating losses and unused investment tax credits. However, because of the time value of money, these carried-over benefits lose value, making the ability to sell them in the year of investment a financially attractive prospect.

As beneficial as this might appear to be, NFIB members view such a tax benefit as a direct government subsidy to unprofitable firms. For this reason, 63 percent of NFIB's membership voted against retention of safe harbor leasing in a recent Mandate poll.

The Treasury Department has analyzed the utilization of the safe harbor leasing rules as reported on IRS form 6793. The data, as of this date, has not been analyzed by size of firm, but Treasury has been requested to provide such data. Nevertheless, preliminary comments about small business utilization can be made from the available information.

Out of 16,036 leases which were entered into, 8,870 represented leases with property valued at less than $100,000. The total value of all leases in this category were $224 million. However, the value of all leases were $19.332 billion, so just 1.2 percent of the total of all leases were of the $100,000 or less size. The next category of leases values was $100,000 to $1 million, which represented only 5.4 percent of the total value of all leases.

With this pattern of utilization in dollars, it is all too clear that the large dollar transactions comprised the bulk of all leases. Furthermore, since it is common for large numbers of multiple purchases of smaller value to take place, it is quite possible that many of the smaller purchases were made by larger firms.

Recent news articles confirm that the major beneficiaries of the leasing rules are the larger multi-national conglomerates, for whom safe harbor leasing has been a true windfall. Many large firms have been able to wipe out large tax liabilities, some as high as $400 million for 1981.

It is argued, by some, that if leasing is repealed, the sorely needed economic recovery will not materialize. Closer to the truth is that economic recovery will not materialize if the deficit and interest rates remain at their current levels. Lower interest rates will help vastly more businessmen and individuals than the few thousand firms benefiting from safe harbor leasing.

Mr. GRASSLEY. While I do not favor my able colleague from Montana's amendment, since I was a party to the Finance Committee compromise, I will support Senator DURENBERGER. Nevertheless, the Senator from Montana has raised some good points which I would like to elaborate upon.

An issue of particular concern to my constituents who are involved in the purchase of agricultural equipment has been the tax treatment of leases. One of the greatest benefits to these constituents in the safe harbor leasing provision was the elimination of the requirement that a farmer purchase an asset at the end of the lease term for fair market value. Safe harbor leasing enabled buyers and sellers to set a fixed purchase price option when the contract was negotiated, enabling the seller to offer the buyer better terms. Not only was the availability of a fixed purchase price option term advantageous because it enabled the farmer and the seller to construct an economically efficient transaction, it also provided the farmer-purchaser with a greater degree of certainty.

In the late 1970's, there was a heavy demand for farm equipment. A farmer who purchased equipment in the early 1970's on a 5-year lease would find that at the expiration of the lease term the fair market value of that same tractor was greater than the original purchase. Remembering this recent lesson, many farmers are reticent to engage in a lease transaction unless they are given the certainty of a fixed price purchase option. Hence, the effect of repealing safe harbor leasing is to greatly diminish sales of agricultural implements.

As a party to the leasing compromise I was unaware that the phasing out of safe harbor leasing would have such a dramatic impact on agricultural equipment purchases. While the agricultural implement market will function well after 1985 when the fixed purchase price option will be law and safe harbor will be totally phased out, until 1985 the sale of agricultural equipment may be very difficult. This unfortunate result flows from the fact the current compromise language precludes any lessee from purchasing more than 45 percent of his equipment annually under the safe harbor provisions. It is not uncommon for a farmer's major purchase for any taxable year to be an agricultural implement ranging from $50,000 to $175,000 in price. Because only 45 percent of the property that a farmer may purchase can be covered by a safe harbor lease, if a farmer acquires only one piece of equipment in a taxable year, only a portion of that acquisition can be leased to a farmer with a fixed purchase price option. If the fixed purchase price option is removed, a lease transaction is a more expensive way of acquiring agricultural equipment than the outright purchase of the equipment financed with a 17.9-percent interest rate. The current agricultural recession is well publicized. Very few of my constituents can afford to purchase farm equipment at an 18-percent interest rate; therefore, it is likely that very few farmers will buy new equipment and unemployment in this industry, like Deere & Co., International Harvester, and J. I. Case will remain high. The plight of farm implement manufacturers and their dealership networks is well documented. This unfortunate change in the tax law may only hasten the demise of many fine firms and their dealers.

This committee compromise virtually eliminates any beneficial effect of leasing for most of my constituents until 1985. I urge all of my colleagues to adopt a provision which provides some relief to those farmers throughout the Nation who are feeling the effects of the current recession. These are not the individuals who are engaging in the well-publicized tax benefit transfers. They are farmers who need the certainty the fixed purchase price option provides in planning for their businesses in these uncertain economic times. I ask your support for the compromise before us which permits the acquisition of up to $150,000 in farm implements in a leasing transaction, using the fixed purchase price option.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I want to express a concern that the new restrictions on safe harbor leasing may discourage U.S. corporations from repatriating overseas earnings and reinvesting them in the United States. I do not believe it was the intention of the Finance Committee that such an effect should occur.

A major employer in my State, for example, has foreign operations from which it repatriates a substantial amount of its foreign profits each year—more than 50 percent, in fact. That revenue is then invested in Rhode Island to upgrade plant and equipment, to create more jobs and more competitive products. Last year, 30 percent of this firm's domestic capital expenditures were financed with foreign earnings.

Because the company is bringing home overseas profits, it is entitled to a foreign tax credit. The foreign tax credit is a longstanding principle in our tax laws. However, changes in the safe harbor leasing provisions of H.R. 4961 will require a firm to calculate its foreign tax credit based on taxable income without regard to any safe harbor lease transaction it may have entered.

While the purpose of the leasing changes is to prevent abuses, this particular provision appears to restrict the ability to use foreign tax credits and, thereby, discourages the repatriation of foreign earnings to be invested in the United States.

It is my hope that this unintended problem can be resolved during conference between the Senate and the House on H.R. 4691. I know the chairman of the Finance Committee is aware of the situation, and I would be happy to work on it with him at the appropriate time.●

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes in opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the committee has tightened up enormously in the area of safe harbor leasing, so much so that what the committee agreed to was agreed to by a vote of 20 to 0 with Mr. BAUCUS voting "aye." What we have in the bill has already been enormously tightened. To do what the Senator is asking for amounts to putting an enormous tax on failing companies who are having a very difficult time making it in the midst of a cruel recession. It amounts to voting many of them out of business.

We have tightened up so much that a great number of people cannot use the leasing provisions at all. To go beyond that is actually voting to destroy a great number of companies that deserve a chance under the existing rule.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I object.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate on the subject of safe harbor leasing for 45 seconds.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 45 seconds remaining.

Mr. DOLE. I yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding.

I rise in support of the amendment which the Senator from Montana has offered and briefly can summarize the reasons why it should be adopted.

Testimony before the Finance Committee persuades me that first safe harbor leasing has been significantly abused; subsidizes unprofitable investment; discriminates against small businesses and startup businesses relying on used equipment; distorts the neutrality of tax laws; diverts investment toward depreciable assets and away from such vitally necessary investments as new and patentable technology, research, and energy exploration; promises to be a huge budget buster in later years; is an inefficient use of capital.

Mr. President, this amendment, if adopted, will just about put the tax bill back on target with reconciliation needs in light of the other amendments adopted.

For all of these reasons I urge adoption of the amendment.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING

Mr. President, to the unitiated, safe harbor leasing—new to the American vocabulary—may invoke visions of a rented yacht anchored restfully on placid waters.

Far from it. Safe harbor leasing is far and away the most stormy tax issue of the day. Originating from last year's tax cut law, safe harbor leasing refers to provisions removing all previous restraints on corporate equipment leasing transactions. It permits cash-starved corporations to sell their unused tax credits to other firms needing tax deductions to reduce their tax liability. The stakes are incredibly high. Safe harbor leasing could affect as much as $150 billion in new plant and equipment purchases over the next 6 years, and $30 billion in Federal revenue.

Without safe harbor, some firms will cancel huge equipment purchases, and others may be forced into bankruptcy. But retaining safe harbor will certainly disadvantage some firms, possibly also to the point of bankruptcy.

With so much at stake, the battle lines were drawn soon after Congress enacted safe harbor a year ago. The pitched battle is between those who believe safe harbor is the only lifeline keeping the auto, steel, airline, and other economically distressed industries in business and those who argue that safe harbor is nothing more than corporate food stamps.

The battle came to a head last week during Finance Committee action on the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. The result is a compromise which eliminates the most objectionable features of safe harbor leasing.

But the reform does not repeal safe harbor outright and therefore falls short of what should be done. Like many in Congress, I share the conclusion of Dr. Alan Greenspan, once Chairman of the President's Council on Economic Advisers, that this leasing "is the equivalent of food stamps for undernourished corporations."

Safe harbor leasing should be repealed. Safe harbor:

Has been significantly abused;

Subsidizes unprofitable investments;

Discriminates against small businesses, and startup businesses relying on used equipment;

Distorts the neutrality of tax laws;

Diverts investment toward depreciable assets, and away from such vitally necessary investments as new and patentable technology, research, and energy exploration;

Promises to be a huge buster in later years;

Is an inefficient use of capital;

Undermines taxpayer confidence in the fairness and equity of the tax system; and Undermines more promising and efficient efforts to assist American business—large and small—to prosper, flourish and remain profitable.

To understand fully why safe harbor leasing merits repeal requires a review of past and present tax policy and theory, as well as grasping the future consequence of safe harbor leasing. Equally important is the transformation in public opinion about private enterprise, and how safe harbor undermines the currently healthy American attitude toward profitable businesses.

Private business is now basking in new found public popularity. Americans now believe in the necessity of capital formation, thrift, productivity, and profit. This is reflective in public opinion polls, skyrocketing enrollment in college business schools, and union wage concessions that improve the bottom line.

It has not always been that way. The 1970's saw public attitudes about successful enterprises sour. "Capitalistic pigs," "price gougers" and "obscene profits" were the popular catch words. An antibusiness attitude emerged in the Nation and was reflected in Congress. Americans elected policymakers advocating wage, price, and credit controls, punitive tax rates, heavy Government regulation of business, enforced corporate social responsibility, Government job creation programs, and other nonsensical endeavors.

This antibusiness attitude—and its attendant laws, regulations and judicial findings—took its toll. Government regulation eroded profitability, to the point where Chrysler Corp.—one of the companies who now look to safe-harbor leases to generate desperately needed cash—spends $160 million monthly in regulation compliance. Profits as a percent of the gross national product nosedived 50 percent in the a decade. Key indicators of the Nation's economic vitality faltered. Plant modernization was deferred, productivity slipped, patented technology declined, the stock market stagnated, bankruptcies proliferated while taxes and inflation eroded company profits and worker paychecks.

But public opinion began to change when the antibusiness policies led to the inevitable result of fewer jobs, inability to compete against foreign firms and a decline in modernization and productivity. A new appreciation for the business world began to emerge. Belatedly, Congress realized that new economic policies were needed to get business moving again.

President Reagan reflected this conviction, and last year persuaded Congress to enact his economic recovery tax program. It cut individual and business taxes across the board, and provided economic incentives for new plant and equipment purchases.

But that plan as amended by Congress went too far. Congress sanctioned a near panic effort to assist, at almost any cost, large businesses regardless of their profitability. Just as the congressional pendulum once swung too far against the interests of business, it now swings too far in the direction of bailing out big business. A backlash is in the works and could undermine the healthy new respect for enterprise, ingenuity and profit. This backlash will be triggered by such recent headlines as "Attempt To Cut Poor Firms' Taxes Allow Rich Ones To Pay No Taxes" and "The Great Business Giveaway" and "New Tax Game the Big Guys Play."

Headlines, like appearances, are often deceiving. Corporate America does not consist of wholesale tax evaders. But like any other taxpayer, corporations have the right, even the duty, to do all they legally can to minimize their tax liability.

That is exactly what large American businesses are doing with safe harbor leasing. They are exploiting—in ways not contemplated by Congress—overly generous and misguided leasing provisions.

In essence, safe harbor is a tax transfer mechanism, pure and simple. Safe harbor allows corporations to sell their unused tax credits to other firms that need tax deductions to reduce their corporate tax liability. Safe harbor leasing is a true bonanza for big business. Consider the following:

General Electric used safe-harbor leases so effectively that it received a tax refund of $150 million, even though it had income of $1.65 billion. GE strongly supports repeal of safe harbor, saying it simply cannot be justified.

Amoco, Inc. bought $417 million in safe-harbor leases, and cut its taxes substantially while reducing wildcat exploration 20 percent because of a "tax induced capital shortage."

Occidental Petroleum had total earnings of $710 million, but paid no taxes in part because safe-harbor leases preserved foreign tax credits it had received for oil payments made in part to Libya.

The New York Transit Authority—even though tax-exempt—used safe-harbor leasing last year because of a special exemption written into law. The leases were used to buy foreign manufactured subway cars. The middlemen received a tidy profit, $1 million on the total $15 million transaction.

These are the horror stories showing the consequences of safe harbor leasing. But these are only part of the story. Safe harbor is big business. Since August, $17.4 billion in equipment has been leased under the new rules, and the transfer of unused tax benefits reduced Federal revenue by $4 billion. By 1987, the total revenue loss could easily exceed $30 billion on leases worth $150 billion.

I want to stress that I do not criticize these companies or any others which have taken advantage of the safe-harbor leasing provisions. They are perfectly justified in doing so. Every taxpayer is required to fully comply with provisions of law which are to the taxpayer's disadvantage and has, in my opinion, a corresponding right to fully utilize favorable Tax Code sections. What I do criticize is the law itself.

But political perception, horror stories and sheer volume alone are not enough to justify repeal of safe harbor leasing. What is safe harbor leasing, how does it work and can the tax principle it represents be justified?

BACKGROUND ON THE LAW PRIOR TO SAFE HARBOR LEASING

Only taxpaying property owners can claim depreciation deductions and investment credits. Companies that pay no taxes may not claim these tax benefits.

As a result, nontaxable companies rent equipment from taxable companies that can benefit from tax deductions and credits. This produces lower taxes for the company owning the property, and lower rental fees for the company leasing the equipment. Equipment leasing is a major means of providing equipment users with capital equipment. In 1981 alone, $40 billion in capital equipment was leased.

But there is a potential tax abuse in these leasing arrangements, and it depends on whether a particular arrangement is actually a lease, or merely a case of the nominal owner just financing the equipment that is used and essentially owned by the company paying no taxes. If the IRS determines that the arrangement is truly a lease, then the lessee can deduct the rental payments as a business deduction, and the lessor can deduct the depreciation and claim investment tax credits. If the arrangement is merely a financing transaction and the lessee is the true owner of the property, then only he can deduct the depreciation and claim investment tax credits.

The determination of a lease often is done on a case-by-case basis relying on three past IRS rulings. Essentially, five requirements must be met that insure the lessor has an equity investment in the lease, will profit from the lease independent of the tax benefits and that the lessee does have a direct financial investment interest in the leased property.

REASONS FOR CHANGE

Under the old law, corporations losing money (and, therefore, paying no taxes) could not fully benefit from depreciation deductions. These unused deductions only added to existing operating losses.

The new tax law changed depreciation schedules by permitting firms faster tax write-offs—known as accelerated depreciation, or ACRS—of equipment purchases. The new ACRS schedule benefits profitable firms by reducing their taxes and, thus, increases working capital for more business expansion. At the same time, however, ACRS does not help unprofitable or marginally profitable firms which cannot take advantage of accelerated depreciation. To help such firms, Congress enacted safe harbor leasing.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING

In tax theory, a safe harbor means that a tax benefit will be granted without challenge if the taxpayer applying for the benefit meets specified requirements. This taxpayer has sailed into a "safe harbor."

Last year's tax bill provided a safe harbor for determining whether a transaction was a lease or a financing arrangement. To qualify for the safe harbor, five easily satisfied conditions had to be met. The conditions are so loose that virtually any leasing transaction qualifies as a lease, regardless of who owned what property for what purpose under what terms. For example, the new law permits a lessor to receive the tax benefits associated with equipment ownership even though he may not in fact actually own the equipment.

The bottom line is this: Safe harbor repeals what had been a fundamental principle or tax law. Formerly the substance of a transaction rather than its form determined Federal income tax treatment. It also used to be a basic rule of tax law that a transaction must serve some general business purpose aside from merely reducing taxes. Because leasing is a transferability provision, many of the transactions will have no business purpose other than tax reduction. In other words, safe harbor permits a corporation unable to use its tax deductions and credits to sell them to a corporation that can, even though property never changes hands and no new business investment occurs.

Consider the following hypothetical example: Seller Corp. cannot use the tax benefits associated with a $10 million equipment purchase. It sells the tax benefits (ACRS deductions and investment tax credits) to Buyer Corp. for $2 million cash plus a 9-year note for $8 million. Buyer Corp. then leases the equipment back to Seller Corp. with lease payments equal to the note payments. Thus, no cash changes hands after the initial transaction. After 9 years, Seller Corp. purchases the equipment for as little as $1. The Seller Corp. retains titled ownership to the equipment, so all that really changes hands is tax benefits for upfront cash.

In this example, who got what? Buyer Corp. received a $1 million investment tax credit and a 5-year write-off of the equipment under ACRS. Seller Corp. gets $10 million in equipment for $8 million. The reduction in equipment cost is actually provided by the U.S. Treasury, and ultimately the American taxpayer, yet no actual new business investment actually occurred.

The question comes down to this: Should other taxpaying Americans (who earn an average of $19,000) have his tax money foot the tax bill to help some large corporation reduce its tax liability through a paper transaction of absolutely no economic substance?

In my judgment, the answer is, no.

This is not idle or abstract tax theory. Safe harbor adversely affects real-world business decisions.

The classic example of this exists in the airline industry. Some airlines seek to use cash made available through safe harbor leasing to help buy new fuel efficient, modern, quiet, safer planes. Undoubtedly these equipment purchases will create new jobs in airplane manufacturing companies, and make the industry more competitive. But other airline companies point out that the industry is already plagued by excess seat capacity, and the last thing the industry needs is more planes. These firms also rely on used planes that do not qualify for safe harbor leases. So, in essence, with enactment of safe harbor leasing, Congress has said it favors one company over another in this economically distressed industry, and that it favors large businesses over smaller, newer firms.

That should not be Government's role.

Safe harbor leasing advocates argue that leasing is the principal means by which ACRS benefits are distributed evenhandedly and efficiently between profitable and unprofitable companies, that safe-harbor is not a radical new departure from the old law, that the press has distorted the impact of safe-harbor leasing and that safe-harbor does not prop up inefficient companies.

These and other arguments simply do not hold water, in my opinion. Here is why safe harbor leasing should be repealed.

SAFE HARBOR HAS BEEN ABUSED

The cases cited earlier—GE, Amoco, Occidental Petroleum and others—reflect the significant potential for abuse of safe harbor.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING SUBSIDIZES UNPROFITABLE INVESTMENTS

Dr. Alan Greenspan equates leasing with food stamps for undernourished corporations. The reality is even harsher than that because leasing causes corporations to misallocate their resources for purely tax-induced reasons.

Even worse, leasing permits a corporation that pays no tax to receive the cash value of its investment tax credits and depreciation deductions.

Incredible though it may seem, six corporate supporters of safe harbor leasing testified before the House Ways and Means Committee that they would rather see leasing maintained than the corporate income tax repealed.

SAFE HARBOR SKEWS INVESTMENT TOWARD DEPRECIABLE ASSETS

Safe harbor does not apply either to intangible drilling costs or other intangible assets. Therefore, leasing makes investment in plant and equipment more attractive than drilling for oil, or investment in research and development.

SAFE HARBOR DISTORTS THE NEUTRALITY OF THE TAX LAW

The goal of tax policy is to equalize the cost of capital for all businesses. Yet leasing permits nontaxable companies to sell their tax benefits, and pay a far lower effective tax rate than their taxable competitors.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING IS UNAVAILABLE TO SMALL BUSINESSES

To quote Mike McKevitt of the National Federation of Independent Business:

Just as with many of our Nation's well intentioned social welfare programs, this big business welfare program is too expensive, and in fact, counterproductive. Take this money . . . and reduce the deficit . . .

SAFE HARBOR LEASING DISTORTS PROFITS

Because cash received in safe harbor leases is treated as gain, a shareholder will be misled as to corporate profitability from operations. In fact, some lease brokers report that the only reason some major transactions are being done is to provide a "kick" to earnings.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING WILL BE EXPANDED IF NOT REPEALED

Because leasing violates so many fundamental tax principles, it will be impossible to limit its application. For example, efforts are already underway in Congress to extend safe harbor leasing to tax-exempt institutions, municipal fire departments and to cove intangible drilling costs.

SAFE HARBOR LEASING UNDERMINES PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE TAX SYSTEM

To quote the Joint Tax Committee's "Analysis of Safe Harbor Leasing":

A fundamental principle of U.S. tax policy has been that the tax system should be structured so as to appear to be as fair as possible. Studies show that voluntary compliance with the tax laws declines rapidly to the extent people believe the tax system to be inequitable. . . In the months after its enactment, the safe harbor leasing provisions appear to have been the subject of widespread public perceptions of unfairness, perceptions which could be injurious to a tax system based on voluntary compliance.

SAFE HARBOR REPEALS FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF TAX LAW

A safe harbor lease does not have to have any economic substance as a lease. It is a paper transaction, a mere transfer of benefits. It used to be that a lease had to show a positive cash flow as well as profit, and the lessor had to actually own the equipment as well as have a minimum investment in the property. Safe harbor leasing repealed these sensible rules.

For all of these reasons and more, Congress should repeal safe harbor leasing.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, this vote is really a test of where we place our priorities. Yes, it may be possible to score a few political points with a few people by playing politics with leasing. But at whose expense?

At the expense of the 10,000 aerospace workers whose jobs depend on orders that cannot be built without safe-harbor leasing as a financing mechanism?

At the expense of this Nation's basic industries like rail, steel, and automobiles, industries whose ability to invest and modernize swing so heavily on continuation of leasing?

At the expense of farmers and farm equipment dealers, who have used safe harbor to finance farm investments when the recession and falling farm income took away cash flow?

There are three points, Mr. President, that every Senator should bear in mind when voting on this amendment.

First, it is essential to bear in mind that the language in this bill eliminates each and every one of the loopholes that led to abuse of safe-harbor leasing over the past 6 months.

The original law was hastily drafted, and frankly, poorly drafted. Companies like General Electric and Occidental Petroleum found loopholes in the law and crawled through them. But the language Senator DOLE and I incorporated in this bill closes all of those loopholes:

It takes companies like Occidental, whose foreign tax credits would shelter leasing benefits, out of the leasing market.

It closes the notorious "General Electric" loophole by preventing any company from carrying back acquired tax benefits to prior years.

It puts firm limitations on the degree to which any company—lessor or lessee—may participate in safe-harbor leasing.

There are numerous additional changes, and I will not take the Senate's time to reiterate each one in detail. But the real measure of their impact lies in the dollars they save. And the Joint Tax Committee confirms that by closing these loopholes, the bill saves at least $7.3 billion over the next 3 years.

Second, Mr. President, while we review what the compromise does it is essential to recognize what it does not do. By preserving the essence of safe-harbor leasing—without the loopholes—the amendment does not return us to the old "leverage-leasing system," which provided huge windfalls for the big leasing companies and lawyers and accountants, and such meager returns for the basic industries we are trying to help.

Contrary to popular belief, the use of leasing as a tax-transfer mechanism did not originate with the safe-harbor provisions in ERTA. They started in 1962 with I.T.C. On the contrary, tax transfers were at the heart of the conventional leverage-leasing transactions that took place with regularity prior to the adoption of safe harbor. The problem was that under the complex rules governing leverage leasing, all the "leverage" in the transaction belonged to the leasing company. As a result, the leasing companies were able to retain a disproportionate share of the tax benefits, with a disproportionately small share passing through to the lessee. The safe-harbor rules were constructed to change this balance of power in favor of the lessee, and by any reasonable criteria they have accomplished that objective.

Treasury's audit of 1981 tax returns reveals that under safe-harbor leasing, an average of 84 percent of the tax benefits passed through to the lessee. Under the leverage leasing system, the percentage rarely exceeded 40 or 50 percent.

Safe harbor leasing also simplifies these transactions tremendously, cutting down the expense for lawyers, accountants, and other middlemen. United Airlines recently observed that under the old leverage leasing law, its airplane leases ran an average of 292 pages in length. Under safe harbor, these leases average 17 pages.

Treasury's audit established that middlemen costs for safe harbor leases have averaged about 1 percent of the tax benefits—a decrease of up to 500 percent from the middlemen rakeoffs under the old leverage leases. You know as well as I do that it is not the leasing company who pays these expenses, and the greater efficiencies that come with safe harbor have enabled farmers, farm equipment dealers, and other small businesses to gain the benefits of leasing to a degree that would be impossible under the old law.

There should not be any confusion in any Senator's mind about who wins and who loses if we pass this amendment, repeal safe harbor leasing, and go back to the old leverage leasing law. You just have to look out in the hallway and see who is lobbying for safe harbor, and who is lobbying for repeal. Who has been fighting for reform and retain safe harbor? Steel companies, automobile companies, farmers, mass transit authorities and other lessees. Who has been lobbying for repeal and return to leverage leasing? General Electric and the other big leasing companies.

General Electric Credit was the biggest profiteer under the old leverage leasing law. GE fought hard to prevent the passage of safe harbor. When it did pass, GE was the biggest abuser of the new laws loopholes—a tactic apparently designed to fill the GE coffers while assuring that the new law would be repealed. And now GE has been the loudest voice calling for repealing safe harbor and return to the old leverage leasing system—a system that would once again mean windfall profits and near monopoly for—you guessed it—General Electric Credit.

Mr. President, I do not believe that Congress proper role is to insure large profits for leasing companies. By restoring a system that halves the lessees returns and quadruples the rakeoff to legal and accounting middlemen. And that is exactly what you are going to get if Congress votes today to repeal the Durenberger-Dole compromise. This vote presents a remarkably clear choice between the interests of the large leasing companies and the interests of the basic industries, the farmers, and the steel and auto workers this law was designed to benefit.

I am voting with the lessees, Mr. President, and I urge every one of my colleagues to do the same.

Finally, it is essential to recognize that for all its problems, safe-harbor leasing has done a tremendous amount of good. Audits at Boeing and McDonnel-Douglas show that safe-harbor leasing has been directly responsible for preserving more than 10,000 jobs in the aerospace industry alone. Although precise figures are not available, the impact on steel and autmobiles has certainly been comparable.

Safe harbor is facilitating more than $500 million in investments to modernize the Nation's steel facilities and a nearly equal investment in the essential modernization of our automobile production facilities at Ford, Chrysler, and American Motors.

Safe harbor has also cited as the singlemost important factor in keeping the Nation's farm equipment dealers in business through this recession.

In what I believe was an excellent editorial last April, the Minneapolis Tribune describes safe-harbor leasing as a good law with a bad image. The test we face today is whether the U.S. Senate is willing to consider this kind of issue on its image or on its merits. The Finance Committee has gone a long, long way to cure this image problem by adopting an amendment which closes the loopholes which produced it. And any Senator who thinks this body can improve its public image by giving General Electric what it wants and returning to the old leverage leasing system is badly mistaken. The right vote on this amendment is no.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I strongly believe that we should maintain the basic provisions of safe harbor leasing and the accelerated cost recovery system enacted last year to stimulate business investment. Not only have these provisions encouraged the growth of many new businesses, they have also meant millions of dollars in reinvestment aid to ailing Michigan industries.

The situation in my State is critical. Michigan has the highest unemployment rate in the country. I cannot envision any substantial improvement in the near future if the Congress strips distressed industries of the only incentive they were given in last year's Economic Recovery Tax Act.

The automobile industry desperately needs the capital to improve its products and increase productivity in order to meet foreign competition. Because the industry is at the low point of its economic cycle, investment tax credits and the ACRS incentives are useless to most auto manufacturers. Safe harbor leasing has given them the incentive to invest, and it has done so in a practical manner.

For example, Ford Motor Co.'s 1981 expenditure for facilities and tooling in the United States amounted to slightly more than $1 billion. Spending levels in 1982 will be substantially higher. Ford received $153 million in safe harbor leasing revenue in 1981. Without the benefits of safe harbor leasing, Ford might have had to close more plants and lay off more workers to reduce overhead. Chrysler Corp. and American Motors Corp. also gained urgently needed capital through safe harbor transactions. And not only do these automakers benefit, but their suppliers, severely hurt by the automobile industry's depressed condition, reap some of the rewards as well.

I support proposals to place limitations on the percentage of total tax liability for which a firm may use the safe harbor leasing provision. No profitable firm should be allowed to use the provision to completely offset its tax liability. We must make certain, however, that the safe harbor leasing rules remain available to companies who could otherwise utilize the new depreciation rules.

Safe harbor leasing is equitable tax policy. It creates no new tax credits or deductions. It eliminates the need for companies presently in need of cash for new equipment and retooling of products to merge with profitable corporations in order to survive. And most importantly, it will help to bolster our national economy and put Americans back to work.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by my good friends from Arkansas and Montana.

The safe harbor leasing provisions of last year's tax bill are not a work of art. They are, however, a roundabout procedure for achieving an essential goal. These provisions permit an unprofitable company to sell tax benefits generated by a new investment to a profitable company that can utilize the tax benefits. Then the unprofitable company can invest the money from the sale of these benefits in new plants and equipment.

The safe harbor leasing provisions can stand some improvement, and the Finance Committee's version goes in the direction of taking care of the abuses. For example, the committee version will allow a buyer of tax deductions and credits to eliminate not more than half of its tax liability as a result of safe harbor leasing. This provision is important if leasing is to avoid being classified in the public's mind as a tax boondoggle.

But we must distinguish between the need for reform and the stampede to repeal. Safe harbor leasing taken as a whole has primarily benefited the distressed industries in need of retooling to improve their productivity. I know that in my State of Michigan, the automobile industry has been able to utilize the leasing provisions to make new investments in equipment which would have been impossible under the leasing rules which were in effect prior to last year's tax bill. In a study by Arthur Anderson and Co. released earlier this year, it was found that most of the companies which sold their tax deductions and credits were in the distressed industry category.

Therefore, the remedy for the problems with safe harbor leasing is not outright repeal. Repeal would frustrate the basic goal of last year's business tax reduction by saying that those firms which are most in need of incentives for capital investment will be unable to take any advantage whatsoever of those incentives. Repeal would lessen the possibility that some businesses in this country would be able to accumulate the capital necessary to improve their productivity and compete effectively with foreign producers. Finally, repeal would cost jobs among businesses and industries which are already reeling under the pressure of high interest rates.

So, the Senate must be careful not to rush to totally repeal safe harbor leasing in an effort to achieve some symbolic, victory over tax loopholes for business. I urge my colleagues to consider the real, and not only the symbolic, consequences of their acts. If businesses starving for capital are unable to make new investments, that is not a real victory. If businesses on the edge of solvency are forced to close their doors, that is not a real victory. And if people on the assembly line are forced to go on the unemployment line, that is not a real victory.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1150

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator PERCY, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, point of order. Is there any time left to consider amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has made a point of order. There is no time for debate. However, Senators may call up their amendments. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), for himself and Mr. PERCY, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1150.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, this amendment relates to the so-called——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time for debate.

Mr. DANFORTH. Parliamentary inquiry. It is my understanding that there was a unanimous-consent agreement for 2 minutes to a side to explain what the amendments were.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not correct.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to explain this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. Please remain quiet so we may hear the clerks report.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I withdraw my request that the amendment be read.

The amendment is as follows:

After line 12, page 292 insert "Such amendments shall also not apply to distributions made pursuant to a plan of partial liquidation adopted before July 1, 1982; distributions made pursuant to a plan of partial liquidation adopted before October 1, 1982, where control (within the meaning of section 368(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) was acquired after December 31, 1980, and before July 1, 1982, and the conduct of the business by the distributee is conditioned on approval by a State regulatory authority; and distributions made pursuant to a plan of partial liquidation adopted within 90 days after the acquisition is approved by a Federal regulatory agency where control (as so defined) is acquired after July 1, 1982, pursuant to a binding contract outstanding on December 31, 1980; distributions made pursuant to a plan of liquidation adopted before October 1, 1982, where control (as so defined) was acquired after December 31, 1981, and before July 1, 1982.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, this amendment, offered on behalf of myself and Senator Percy, pertains to the so-called transitional rules relating to mergers and acquisitions. It has to do with when the merger and acquisition section comes into play where some transactions were substantially completed or in the major stages at the time the Finance Committee considered this bill.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Missouri assure the Members of this body that this amendment will not affect the pending Gulf-Cities Service merger?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes, I will.

Mr. President, present law treatment will apply to any distributions pursuant to a plan of partial liquidation adopted by July 1, 1982.

Present law would also apply to distributions in any case where the control of the distributing corporation was acquired between January 1, 1981, and June 30, 1982, and the conduct by the distributee of the business to be acquired in the distribution is subject to approval by a State regulatory agency. Present law will apply to this case only if a plan of partial liquidation is adopted by October 1, 1982.

Present law would also continue to apply in any case where control is acquired after July 1, 1982, pursuant to a binding contract outstanding on December 31, 1980, if completion of the acquisition is subject to approval by a Federal regulatory agency and a plan of partial liquidation is adopted within 90 days after final approval is granted.

Present law would also apply where control was acquired during the first 6 months of 1982 and a plan of liquidation is adopted before October 1, 1982.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I sent to Senator DOLE, dated July 21, 1982, be printed in the RECORD that would explain the nature of this amendment.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982.

HON. ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BOB: Beatrice Foods Co. has brought to my attention a particular problem it has with the section of partial liquidation of the merger and acquisition provisions of the pending tax bill.

On January 13, 1982, Beatrice purchased all of the stock of several of the subsidiaries of Northwest Industries for $580 million. This acquisition met with the approval of Northwest Industries. It was not a "hostile" takeover. At the time of agreement, the transaction was structured to allow for future partial or complete liquidation. Unfortunately, Beatrice appears to be caught by the transition rules proposed by the Finance Committee. Though Beatrice relied on the law in effect on January 13, they appear to be penalized by being forced to complete their liquidation and distribution by August 31. Such a rapid liquidation, without adequate time for appraisal, could prove very costly to the company.

Beatrice suggests a revised transition rule which would permit acquisitions made within a reasonable period before the Senate Finance Committee acted to complete the transaction in an orderly manner by adopting a plan of partial liquidation within two years of the date of the acquisition and completing distribution under that plan no later than July 1, 1984. This period of time roughly parallels the time the same company would have had under existing law to adopt a plan of complete liquidation.

I believe this provides equity for those who relied on present law but does not reopen the partial liquidation provision to those who made no such reliance.

Warm personal regards,

CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH). All those in favor say "aye." Opposed, "no."

The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is requested. Senators in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until counted.

Will members of the staff please step to the rear? Members of the staff will please take their seats.

Mr. FORD. There are no seats left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those opposed will please rise and stand until counted.

On a division, the amendment (UP No. 1150) was agreed to.

Mr. NUNN addressed the Chair.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (7) of section 6103(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to disclosure to Comptroller General), as redesignated by section 1(a), is amended by redesignating subparagraph (B) as subparagraph (C) and by inserting after subparagraph (A) the following new subparagraph:

"(B) AUDITS OF OTHER AGENCIES.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Upon written request by the Comptroller General of the United States to the head of any Federal agency, any returns or return information obtained under this title by such Federal agency for use in any program or activity shall be open to inspection by, or disclosure to, officers and employees of the General Accounting Office for the purpose of, and to the extent necessary in, making an audit authorized by law of such program or activity.

"(ii) INFORMATION FROM SECRETARY.—If the Comptroller General of the United States determines that the returns or return information available under clause (i) are not sufficient for purposes of making an audit of any program or activity of a Federal agency, upon written request by the Comptroller General to the Secretary, returns and return information (of the type authorized by this title to be made available to the Federal agency for use in such program or activity) shall be open to inspection by, or disclosure to, officers and employees of the General Accounting Office for the purpose of, and to the extent necessary in, making such audit.

"(iii) REQUIREMENT OF NOTIFICATION UPON COMPLETION OF AUDIT.—Within 90 days after the completion of an audit with respect to which returns or return information were opened to inspection or disclosed under clause (i) or (ii), the Comptroller General of the United States shall notify in writing the Joint Committee on Taxation of such completion. Such notice shall include—

"(I) a description of the use of the returns and return information by the Federal agency involved,

"(II) such recommendations with respect to the use of returns and return information by such Federal agency as the Comptroller General deems appropriate, and

"(III) a statement on the impact of any such recommendations on confidentiality of returns and return information and the administration of this title.

"(iv) CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS MADE APPLICABLE.—The restrictions contained in subparagraph (A) on the disclosure of any returns or return information open to inspection or disclosed under such subparagraph shall also apply to returns and return information open to inspection or disclosed under this subparagraph.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Subparagraph (C) of section 6103(i)(7) of such Code (as redesignated by this Act) is amended by striking out "subparagraph (A)" and inserting in lieu thereof "subparagraph (A) or (B)".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on the day after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from West Virginia, Senator RANDOLPH, the Senator from West Virginia, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, Senator SASSER, Senator MELCHER, Senator THURMOND, Senator FORD, Senator MOYNIHAN, Senator JOHNSTON, and Senator CANNON be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are accepted en bloc.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to H.R. 4961, which will amend the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Senator CHILES joins me in introducing this legislation. The amendment will restore the Internal Revenue Service to the role it once played in cooperative law enforcement efforts aimed at organized criminals and narcotics traffickers. This amendment is identical to S. 2565, which I introduced on May 25, 1982, and which has been cosponsored by Senators GRASSLEY, DOLE, ROTH, CHILES, RUDMAN, DOMENICI, ZORINSKY, BOREN, DECONCINI, STENNIS, BENTSEN, LONG, PRYOR, HOLLINGS, and COHEN.

Moreover, this amendment is the product of a long history of efforts to responsibly and fairly amend the Tax Reform Act. It is similar to S. 732, which I and 19 other cosponsors introduced in the Senate on March 17, 1981. S. 732 was passed by the Senate on July 27, 1981, as amendment No. 492 to the Economic Recovery Act of 1981. Unfortunately, a similar amendment was not enacted by the House of Representatives. The conference report concerning these provisions recommended full hearings on H.R. 1502 in the House and on its companion bill, S. 732, in the Senate prior to passage.

Hearings in both the House and Senate were held shortly after the conference report was issued. I call attention to the efforts of Senator GRASSLEY, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight of the Internal Revenue Service, in conducting very thorough and bipartisan hearings on S. 732 and the issue of tax disclosure. Senator GRASSLEY, as well as Senator DOLE, as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and their staffs worked long and hard on this issue and joined me in introducting S. 2565. I also recognize the efforts of Congressman RANGEL, chairman of the House Oversight Subcommittee, as well as Congressman ROSTENKOWSKI, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, who devoted many hours of study to this same legislation. Both of the subcommittees received considerable testimony on all sides of this issue.

As a result, I introduced S. 2565, identical to the amendment I now offer. This legislation is the result of joint bipartisan efforts of the interested parties in both the Senate and the House. By agreement, we arrived at an acceptable compromise bill. It is identical to a bill which Representative RANGEL, chairman of the House Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means, introduced in the House on May 5, 1982. The House bill was approved and reported out of the House Committee on Ways and Means on June 9, 1982. This amendment not only reflects a consensus of agreement between the Senate sponsors and the House Committee on Ways and Means, but also the Department of Justice, whose representatives worked closely with staff during the drafting process.

The reforms contemplated by this amendment are strongly supported by facts and evidence produced in Senate hearings. Specifically, the amendment is a direct outgrowth of extensive work done by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, where I served as chairman during the 96th Congress and currently serve as ranking majority member.

Our subcommittee spent a large part of the last 3 years investigating various aspects of organized crime, labor racketeering, and narcotics trafficking. As I look back on our studies and hearings, I am astounded at the size and sophistication of these triple menaces to the well-being of our Nation.

The "underground economy" is estimated at upward of $124 billion a year, of which the traffic in illegal narcotics amounts to somewhere between $68 and $89 billion. Included in these astronomical figures are an estimated $25 to $50 billion in unreported and untaxed profits.

All of this money has had a tremendous inflationary impact on the economy of several regions of the country, especially Florida, Texas, and the Southwest areas bordering Mexico. Even my home State of Georgia has experienced an increase in narcotics trafficking, for as enforcement authorities have cracked down on smuggling into Florida from South America, many traffickers have moved their operations northward.

The permanent subcommittee explored this problem extensively, and in December of 1979 we conducted very thorough hearings on illegal narcotics profits. We issued a comprehensive report on this investigation in August 1980 (S. Rept. No. 96-887).

It has long been recognized that financial investigations, relying on financial and tax records, are one of the most effective tools in piercing the veil of secrecy that protects those at the top of any organized crime ring—be it a drug smuggling operation or a traditional organized crime family.

Indeed, it was the ability of the Internal Revenue Service to conduct sophisticated financial investigations that sent such notorious mobsters as Al Capone and Frank Costello to jail on income tax evasion charges when other agencies were unable to gather enough evidence of nontax crimes to have them indicated, much less convicted.

We found, however, that even though organized crime and narcotics trafficking have become bigger and more sophisticated than ever before, the one law enforcement agency that the kingpin criminals fear most—the IRS—had withdrawn from the fray.

Prosecutors and others involved in Federal law enforcement testified before our subcommittee that they were hindered in doing financial investigations by the reluctance of IRS to lend them a hand in attacking those who call the shots in organized crime and narcotics trafficking. This testimony was given to the Subcommittee on Investigations not only in the "Illegal Narcotics Profits" hearing in 1979, but in virtually every hearing we have conducted over the past 3 years concerning law enforcement issues. Again and again, when we held hearings on organized crime and the use of violence in 1980, when we held hearings on the Labor Department's investigation of the Central States pension fund in 1980, in hearings on waterfront corruption in 1981 and, most recently, again in hearings on international narcotics trafficking last November, we have heard the same refrain: The withdrawal of IRS from joint law enforcement investigations of organized crime, labor racketeers and narcotics traffickers has had a severely adverse effect upon law enforcement efforts against these criminals groups.

We found that there were two prime reasons for this withdrawal by the IRS. One was the disclosure provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1976. The other was a general attitude on the part of IRS officials that the agency only should collect taxes and not serve in any capacity as a nontax law enforcement agency.

IRS ATTITUDE

Between 1974 and 1980, a series of IRS Commissioners and their top aides took the view that IRS should stick to "tax administration"—by which they meant tax collection and only tax collection—and out of the general law enforcement arena.

The IRS decision to stick with tax collection only and avoid criminal law enforcement was welcomed by some who believe that the only proper function of the IRS is tax administration. But these people ignore the simple fact that tax administration goes hand in hand with criminal enforcement. The IRS has been and always will be involved in criminal law enforcement because tax evasion is the end result of any crime that is committed for profit.

The question is not whether we want IRS to be involved in law enforcement for they always have been and always will be. The question is: Whom do we want IRS to concentrate its criminal enforcement efforts on? By adopting the policy of "tax administration" only, the IRS unwittingly altered the focus of its investigations away from the racketeers and drug dealers, who pay no tax on their illicit income, and onto the average, law-abiding citizen who does pay tax on his legally earned income.

The Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations hearings in 1979 and 1980 revealed numerous examples of the problems this attitude created for Federal law enforcement and the adverse impact it was having. Partially as a result of our subcommittee's work, the Carter administration ordered IRS to step up its investigations of suspected narcotics dealers and organized criminals. IRS has devoted more of its resources to these efforts, and it has adjusted some of its policies and interpretations with respect to the disclosure of nontax criminal evidence.

Moreover, since 1980, new leadership in the Internal Revenue service has promulgated a series of regulations encouraging joint tax and nontax criminal investigations with other Federal law enforcement agencies. Several joint investigations have been conducted under these guidelines with great success, among them "Operation Greenback" in Florida. I submit that it was never the intent of Congress, in passing the Tax Reform Act of 1976, to restrict or prohibit these joint investigations. On the contrary, this type of joint investigation is to be encouraged if we are ever to really strike the drug dealers and professional racketeers where they are most vulnerable and where it will hurt them the most—in the pocketbook. I want to commend the IRS for correcting its prior policy, and I believe I speak for all who support the amendment I am introducing today when I stress that this joint enforcement must continue. These changes within the IRS are steps in the right direction. However, the old erroneous attitude of the IRS is only a part of the reason why the IRS withdrew from the enforcement fight against drug dealers and racketeers. We still need to fine tune the Tax Reform Act of 1976 in order to remove some serious and unnecessary roadblocks to IRS active participation in Federal law enforcement.

THE TAX REFORM ACT OF 1976

The disclosure provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1976 are found in section 6103 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6103). They were enacted in the dying days of the 94th Congress and were intended to avoid future abuses of a "Watergate" nature.

Until the act became effective, tax returns were considered to be public records, and access to them was governed by Presidential Executive order. Many Federal agencies, including the White House, had easy access to tax returns for a wide variety of uses.

During the Watergate investigations, it was revealed that the Nixon White House had used tax returns to pressure potential campaign contributors and certain other individuals who were on a White House "enemies list," and that the administration had ordered IRS to conduct audits of its "enemies."

It also was revealed by the Senate Judiciary Committee that an IRS special service staff collected and disseminated information about thousands of individuals and groups which the IRS considered to have "extremist views and philosophies."

In short, various congressional committees found that tax returns and tax information were made available to a number of Federal agencies for many questionable purposes. I think all of us would agree that such disclosure represented an abuse of taxpayer privacy.

I want to point out, however, that the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations was unable to document any abuse of tax information on the part of a Federal prosecutor.

The Watergate abuses were political abuses, not law enforcement abuses. A study done for Congress in 1976 by the Congressional Research Service and entitled, "Internal Revenue Service: History and Matters Dealing With Oversight of Its Practices and Procedures," shows that not only was the attempted misuse of IRS information political in nature, but also that the White House failed miserably in its attempt to misuse the IRS.

Yet, although the problem in 1976 was political, we did not even address the problem of political abuse in the Tax Reform Act of 1976. The Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service frankly admitted in his testimony before our subcommittee that the Watergate abuses which spawned the Tax Reform Act were not even addressed by the act. He said that under current law, if the President told him to go out and audit political enemies, he would not be prohibited from doing so by the Tax Reform Act.

But to cure these perceived abuses, the Tax Reform Act made tax returns and most other information gathered by the IRS confidential and subject to disclosure by IRS only in accordance with very strict procedures. These procedures apply across the board and govern disclosure to all Federal agencies. They are so sweeping that they can be compared to the use of a sledgehammer to kill an ant.

Because of the nontax criminal disclosure provisions in section 6103(i), the average citizen is now the main target for IRS resources. The testimony and statistics developed by 1980 bear this out. Since the 1976 act, IRS efforts in organized crime cases had dropped over 50 percent. Since the 1976 act, IRS efforts against major narcotics traffickers had dropped almost 75 percent. In the fiscal year 1979, IRS could only confirm 9 or 10 convictions against major narcotics dealers. This is despite the fact that narcotics generate $68 to $89 billion a year.

Our investigation has convinced me that the disclosure provisions of section 6103, coupled with the way they had been interpreted and enforced by IRS, have had a highly detrimental effect on our Federal law enforcement system.

In the hearings before the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations on Illegal Narcotics Profits, Oliver B. Revell, then the Deputy Assistant Director of the FBI in the Criminal Investigative Division, told us:

> The [1976] act's disclosure provisions often hamper the FBI's investigation of major ongoing white-collar crime and organized crime cases. When disclosure is sought to assist in the timely issuance of search warrants, or other legitimate law enforcement functions, the delays incurred are excessive to the requirement of investigation. When disclosure is sought, delays of three months are common. Delays of six to nine months have been reported on many occasions.
> The act has resulted in unnecessary waste of taxpayers' dollars, budget funds and investigative time in that the IRS is usually unable to advise us of the cases on which it is working, which precludes us from obtaining close cooperation with IRS and leads, in some instances, to the FBI unknowingly conducting duplicative investigations. * * * It also leads to us being unable to obtain records which have been previously obtained by the IRS and pertain to [an FBI] ongoing investigation. So it delays our investigation and sometimes causes it to be closed because we cannot obtain records that have already * * * been obtained by IRS, when we didn't know of their investigation until we engaged in our investigation.

The Federal law enforcement system is complex and sophisticated. We do not have a Federal police state. Instead, we have a series of agencies broken down by criminal jurisdiction that must operate with a high degree of coordination and cooperation. It is not unusual, in fact it is quite common, to combine the skills and information of many agencies to achieve any measure of success in criminal enforcement.

IRS has a fine tradition and history of being one of the most effective law enforcement agencies, especially in cases involving high echelon criminals. Obviously, since the purpose of criminal ventures is to make money, very few substantive crimes can be committed without some tax consequence, therefore, IRS always has been—and continues to be—a key agency both in terms of financial expertise and in terms of financial information.

Some of the provisions of the Tax Reform Act, however, have caused a severe breakdown in our delicate and complex Federal law enforcement system. It has taken up to 13 months simply to receive the assistance of IRS agents in joint investigations. The Tax Reform Act has helped to create a bureaucratic nightmare in cases where Federal agencies should willingly assist each other.

THE "CATCH 22"

It is possible, of course, for other agencies to obtain tax returns and other IRS-gathered information under section 6103. However, they must apply for a court order in order to get tax returns, and they must make written requests to obtain other IRS information about nontax crimes such as forgery, bribery, or narcotics violations that comes from sources other than tax returns.

In either situation, the requesting agency must describe the information it seeks to obtain.

The court order and written request requirements have created a catch-22 situation. Since IRS agents are forbidden to tell the other agencies of the criminal evidence they gather, it is virtually impossible for these other agencies even to know that such information exists, much less to describe that information with such particularity that they can satisfy the requirements for a court order or written request.

In other words, section 6103 required Federal investigative agencies to go through elaborate request procedures to obtain information that they may not even know that IRS has.

In November 1981 our subcommittee heard testimony from Jay Ethington, an assistant U.S. attorney for the northern district of Texas for the last 10 years. Mr. Ethington, who had prosecuted about 100 different narcotics traffickers, states:

> We have a provision in the disclosure aspect of the Tax Reform Act that says I can gain the authority to get disclosure from IRS agents by going to a Federal judge and getting a court order, but before I can get that court order, I have to get authority from the Department of Justice. To get that authority, I must disclose the information that the IRS agent has that he is going to give me, but he won't give that to me until we get authority. So, we are in a "Catch-22" situation.

This catch-22 situation has made it all but impossible for the FBI, DEA, and other agencies to receive the necessary information and cooperation from the IRS.

Moreover, the application for a court order and the written request for disclosure may be made only by the Attorney General or his assistant, or by the head of a Federal agency. This centralization of all disclosure in a handful of high officials causes unnecessary delay in securing disclosure. A prosecutor in Los Angeles, for example, must secure authority to seek disclosure from an official 3,000 miles away. Most commonly, however, the prosecutor's immediate supervisor, such as the U.S. attorney or the strike force attorney in charge, will be far more familiar with the investigation and far more knowledgeable about the need for disclosure than will the remote official.

DISCLOSURE AMENDMENTS

Our amendments to the Tax Reform Act of 1976 will not scrap the privacy safeguards written into that act. They will strike a balance so that IRS can and will cooperate with Federal prosecutors.

Let me try to dispel some of the unfounded fears of our disclosure amendment by explaining how its provisions will protect the privacy of tax returns and other information supplied to IRS. I am sure that once these provisions are understood—and I admit this is an intricate, sometimes confusing area of the law—they will be accurately seen for their privacy merits as well as their attempt to improve law enforcement.

First, I want to point out that these amendments to the 1976 act leave the vast majority of that act intact. They do not alter the provisions of the 1976 act which prohibit loose distribution to Government agencies. The amendments are aimed at one isolated, specific subsection of the Tax Reform Act disclosure provisions which, in effect, prohibits the IRS from cooperating and exchanging information with other Federal law enforcement agencies.

Second, the amendments give IRS no additional power or authority whatsoever. The amendments do not alter the ability or power of IRS to obtain information in any manner. They do not alter the ability of the IRS to transfer information concerning the average citizen who earns his money legally. The amendments merely allow the IRS to cooperate and exchange information under a very carefully restricted legislative scheme involving court orders and formal written requests concerning criminals who earn their money from illegal means.

Third, the types of information which could be disclosed only by ex parte court order remain the same. This includes tax returns and all supporting attachments, such as W-2 forms, lists of charitable donations, and various other schedules. Information which is protected now by court order will continue to be so protected.

Let us look at the judicial standards that the Justice Department would have to meet before it could gain access to the information protected by court order. In order to obtain an ex parte order, Justice Department attorneys would have to present information believed to be reliable that establishes reasonable cause to believe that a specific criminal act has been committed. Those attorneys would have to establish that the information is sought exclusively for use in a Federal criminal investigation or proceeding, and they would have to establish that the information cannot reasonably be obtained elsewhere, under the circumstances, from another source. Finally, they must show that there is reasonable cause to believe that the information may be relevant to a matter relating to the commission of the criminal act.

We recognize that the information contained in tax returns can normally be secured from sources other than the IRS. In a grand jury investigation, for example, subpenas can be issued to a person's bankers, employers, partners, accountants, and associates in order to secure the records needed to re-create a person's income. However, such means are enormously and unnecessarily time consuming. Also, they vastly increase the risk of disclosing the investigation to the potential defendant and his associates, which in many cases could adversely affect the investigation itself or expose the potential defendant to unfair public attention. Thus, when we speak of reasonably securing the information from other sources, we are recognizing that, in many but not all cases, it would be too time consuming to go to other sources, or that going to other sources could jeopardize the integrity of the investigation.

The standards we propose are essentially the same standards that must be met under Federal law in order for authorities to wiretap our telephones or put listening devices in our homes and offices. It seems to me that if these standards are sufficient to protect the privacy of our most personal conversations, they also are sufficient to protect our tax information.

In addition to these privacy protections, I would point out that the amendment—unlike the existing provision of the Tax Reform Act—would channel all requests for court-ordered IRS information through the Justice Department. Only one agency would be permitted to obtain this information, and the requesting official in every case would be a Government attorney.

Our disclosure amendment is laden with safeguards for the privacy of all information we can reasonably expect to keep private. There will be no wholesale scrapping of privacy here. There will be no "sellout" to a few law enforcement authorities who might like to see their work made easier. There certainly will be no attempt here to create a breeding ground for a repeat of the so-called Watergate abuses. And there certainly will be no "meat-ax" attempt to butcher the Tax Reform Act.

On the other hand, we believe we offer a very balanced, well-thought-out effort to fine tune section 6103 of the Internal Revenue Code which, as the record clearly indicates, needs to be done.

These amendments are the product of over 2 years' hard work on the part of several congressional subcommittees, the Justice Department, and the IRS itself. They have been developed in the broad daylight with the views of all sides considered.

No one who is concerned about the privacy of tax returns or a repetition of the abuses of tax information should fear this amendment. Hard-working, law-abiding taxpayers can rest assured that the information they supply IRS will remain within that agency where it belongs.

The only people that need fear this legislation are narcotics traffickers and organized crime figures and white-collar criminals who are cheating other taxpayers by not paying their fair share. In cases where criminal ventures generate profits, IRS must have the capability to cooperate with and exchange information with the Federal investigate and prosecutive agencies.

It is in this very small area—criminal tax evaders—that we seek our primary change so that IRS and other Federal law enforcement agencies can work even more effectively together against these criminals than they can today. As it now stands, the Tax Reform Act of 1976 makes it much easier for IRS to go after the average taxpayer than the criminals. This is a complete reversal of the societal priorities that we should be encouraging.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, for generations the Internal Revenue Service led the way in this Nation's battle against organized crime and narcotics trafficking, but since 1977 it has hidden behind the disclosure provisions of the Tax Reform Act to stay out of the fray.

It is the time for us to decide that IRS shall become once again the effective force for justice that it was in the days of bootleggers and rumrunners. This amendment will send IRS a clear and unmistakable signal that it should do just that.

We have spent many long hours in drafting what we feel is a very well-reasoned amendment. In doing so we have achieved a fair and responsible consensus of opinion amongst interested parties in both the Senate and the House as well as the very agencies who will be most affected by this legislation. We retain very important privacy safeguards that will prevent any repetition of Watergate-type abuses. At the same time, we impress upon IRS our intention to have it cooperate fully with the fight against the ever-increasing organized crime and narcotics problems facing the Nation. After years of effort, we have at long last reached a broad-based, bipartisan compromise on how to improve the Tax Reform Act of 1976 and thereby improve our Federal law enforcement efforts. It is now time of act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section summary of the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H.R. 4961, AMENDING 26 U.S.C. 6103, 26 U.S.C. 7213, AND 26 U.S.C. 7217

This legislation would streamline and clarify provisions of the Internal Revenue Code governing access to tax information for use in non-tax criminal investigations and prosecutions. The amendment combines the results of both Senate and House hearings on tax disclosure. The most changes proposed would substantially assist federal law enforcement authorities in combatting narcotics trafficking, organized crime and white-collar offenses involving large sums of money. At the same time, the amendment preserves the safeguards for taxpayer privacy established in 1976.

SECTION 1

Disclosure Pursuant to Court Order [26 U.S.C. 6103(i)(1)]:

The revised § 6103(i)(1) preserves the structure of the existing court order provision. The modifications are intended only to clarify existing law and to make the literal terms of the statute comply with actual practice.

For example, the standards in existing (i)(1), if read literally, require a factual showing that cannot be made unless the prosecutor seeking access is already in possession of the information sought. Courts have interpreted this language in a common-sense fashion to require proof only of those facts a federal prosecutor can realistically be expected to demonstrate: that there is reasonable cause to believe a specific federal crime has occurred or is occurring, that there is reasonable cause to believe tax information is relevant to that offense, that the information cannot be reasonably obtained, under the circumstances from another source, and that the information will be used exclusively for investigation and prosecution of that offense. The bill would substitute these standards for those of existing law. Because this merely codifies present practice, it has no practical effect on taxpayer privacy or tax administration. It does, however, reduce the potential for widely varying judicial results and the extreme chilling effect that the unrealistic language of current law has on federal prosecutors who need tax information for legitimate law enforcement purposes.

The proposed standard is more reasonable, with the added safeguard of prosecutorial intervention. The main criticism of the present standard was that it was impossible to meet. Therefore, no one used it. The proposal modifies the third requirement that the Government prove the financial information cannot be obtained from any other source. The fact is that the financial information is "available" elsewhere, but the Government would have to completely reconstruct a taxpayer's bank records to duplicate the information on the return. This third requirement of the present act also requires the Government to prove that the tax return was the most probative evidence of the crime to be proven. Since this section deals only with non-tax crimes, the tax return itself would never be the most probative evidence of the crime. Only the actual financial records would qualify. Thus an impossible standard would be deleted.

The new standards also recognize that there are instances when securing the information from other sources will be too complex or time-consuming, or will jeopardize the investigation and its integrity. In these instances, as well as others depending on the circumstances, it is reasonable to secure the information from the IRS.

The new (i)(1) modifies the class of federal officials who may authorize an application for a court order. Existing law requires all such applications to be routed through Washington for approval before being presented to the court, a requirement which results in substantial delay and paperwork. The new (i)(1)(B) would permit United States Attorneys, special prosecutors appointed under 28 U.S.C. 593, and Attorneys-in-Charge of Organized Crime Strike Forces in the field to present applications directly to the appropriate Federal court for consideration.

The bill would delete the authority currently possessed by all heads of federal agencies to approve (i)(1) applications, thereby centralizing application authority in a single agency, the Department of Justice, where it can be more effectively coordinated. Since 1976, only five applications for (i)(1) orders have been signed by non-Justice Department entities; this change will not, therefore, adversely affect federal agencies.

Finally, the new (i)(1) provides that court orders may be granted by U.S. Magistrates as well as U.S. District Judges. Magistrates are now authorized to grant analogous applications such as those for search and arrest warrants.

Disclosure Pursuant to Formal Law Enforcement Request [26 U.S.C. 6103(i)(2)]:

The revised § 6103(i)(2) clarifies existing law governing requests for return information other than taxpayer return information. As amended, (i)(2) would permit requests to be made by the heads of Federal agencies, Inspectors General, the Director of the FBI, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, United States Attorneys, special prosecutors, and Attorneys-in-Charge of Organized Crime Strike Force field offices, as well as Justice Department officials. This avoids the necessity of routing all requests through Washington. In addition to the heads of agencies now authorized to request (i)(2) information, the bill would grant similar authority to the 15 Inspectors General whose mandate is to combat fraud, waste and abuse in federal programs.

Finally, the revised (i)(2) would modify the factual showing required to support a disclosure of return information other than taxpayer return information by requiring "the specific reason or reasons why such disclosure is, or may be, relevant to such proceeding or investigation". Current law requires a showing of materiality. Like the (i)(1) court order requirement, a prosecutor cannot always show the materiality of tax information to a case without access to the information sought.

IRS-initiated Disclosure [26 U.S.C. 6103(i)(3)]:

The bill encourages IRS to initiate reports of non-tax crime to law enforcement authorities. The new § 6103(i)(3) allows the Secretary the discretion to make such reports to the head of the appropriate Federal law enforcement agency. It permits disclosure of taxpayer identity where information constitutes evidence of a non-tax Federal crime by that taxpayer. This provision reasserts the intention of the Congress that IRS must develop and maintain a system by which its agents who discover evidence of non-tax criminal activity will be able to quickly refer that information to the appropriate law enforcement officials.

Emergency disclosure

The new § 6103(i)(3)(B) would permit IRS, in its discretion, to report to the appropriate law enforcement agencies any circumstances involving imminent danger of death or physical injury to any individual or the imminent flight of any individual from Federal prosecution. This authority for disclosure in rare emergency situations is patterned on the similar provisions of the Financial Privacy Act of 1978 (12 U.S.C. 3414(b)).

Admissibility of Tax Information [26 U.S.C. 6103(i)(4)]:

Finally, the compromise bill would amend (i)(4) of § 6103 to provide that returns and taxpayer return information may be used in judicial and administrative proceedings upon a finding that the information is probative of a matter in issue relevant to the commission of a crime, or the guilt or liability of a party. The bill allows that information to be disclosed in judicial or administrative proceedings pertaining to enforcement of a Federal criminal statute or related civil forfeiture which may be pursued in addition to or in lieu of criminal prosecution.

The amendments to (i)(4) also clarify that returns and return information may be disclosed to a defendant pursuant to the Jencks Act, discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or other discovery requirements. This explicitly protects a defendant's Due Process rights and is consistent with current practice.

The new § 6103(i)(4)(B) also allows disclosure of return information (other than taxpayer return information) without the special findings of relevance applicable to returns and taxpayer return information.

Section 6103(i)(4)(C) prevents the admissibility into evidence of information disclosed under subparagraphs (A)(i) or (B) where the admission would identify a confidential informant or impair a civil or criminal tax investigation.

Disclosure to locate fugitives

The new § 6103(i)(5) allows disclosure of return information by court order in order to locate fugitives from justice where a Federal arrest warrant has been issued for that individual. The showing required for disclosure is similar to that required for normal court ordered disclosure of return information.

The new § 6103(i)(6) prevents any disclosure of return and return information under paragraphs (1), (2), (3)(A), or (5) by the Secretary if such disclosure would identify a confidential informant or seriously impair a civil or criminal tax investigation.

The final portion of Section 1 of the bill contains certain technical conforming amendments necessitated by the changes made in § 6103 set forth above. The bill makes amendments under Section 1 effective on the day after enactment of this Act.

SECTION 2

Civil remedy

Section 2 would amend the civil remedy section of the Internal Revenue Code to make federal agencies liable as defendants in suits alleging unauthorized disclosure of tax information by Federal officers or employees, as opposed to the individual making the disclosure. This change would conform to the Financial Privacy Act of 1978 (12 U.S.C. 3417) and the Administration's proposed Tort Claims Act amendments.

Under present law, civil suits may be filed against both the federal agency and the employee involved. This creates a potential conflict of interest requiring retention of private counsel to represent the employee. Moreover, it is unduly harsh to place federal employees who work with tax information regularly in the position of risking financial ruin daily for any mistaken disclosure.

Of course, federal employees would continue to be subject to aministrative sanctions, including dismissal, for any negligent disclosure as well as criminal prosecution for any willful, corrupt or malicious abuse of tax information. In the event of unlawful disclosure by a non-government employee, the bill imposes civil liability upon the person making the disclosure, as is the case under present law.

The bill limits damages for disclosure to the greater of $9,000 per act of unauthorized disclosure or the sum of actual and, where disclosure is willful or grossly negligent, punitive damages, plus the costs of action. The statute of limitations for such actions is set as two years from the discovery of the unauthorized disclosure by the plaintiff.

Finally, Section 2 includes technical conforming amendment necessitated by the changes made above. Section 2 amendments are made applicable to disclosures made after enactment of this Act.

SECTION 3

Disclosure for Use in GAO Audits [26 U.S.C. 6103(i)(7)]:

Section 3 of the bill authorizes disclosure of returns and return information obtained by or available to a Federal agency under this title when requested in writing by the Comptroller General where necessary for a GAO audit of the program or activity to which the original disclosure related. Within ninety days of the completion of the audit, the Section requires written GAO notice to the Joint Committee on Taxation regarding the nature of the information involved and recommendations as to further use of the information.

Mr. GRASSLEY. This bill strikes a delicate balance between the need of law enforcement for access to tax information and the need to protect the privacy of taxpayer information. This bill clearly sets forth the procedure law enforcement officials must employ to obtain this information. It requires a Federal district court judge or a magistrate to make certain findings before granting a request for return information, that is information submitted to the IRS on tax returns and supporting documents. Lesser standards are required for the disclosure of taxpayer return information—submissions by third parties to the IRS—and these new standards are stated in this bill.

One of the criticisms of the disclosure provisions enacted in 1976 is that they are too complex and cumbersome for U.S. attorneys in the field to use effectively. Senator DOLE and I hope that this bill and the committee report language will clarify these procedures to enable law enforcement personnel to obtain this information quickly. Our intent in drafting this bill is to facilitate the exchange of revelent information between Federal agencies pertinent to the commission of a crime. It is also our intent that Federal agencies continue to work in tandem on joint tax investigations to catch individuals who are committing crimes and failing to pay tax on the proceeds of their illegal criminal activity.

We have strived to protect taxpayer information from fishing expeditions by law enforcement authorities. Information submitted by the taxpayer may only be obtained by court order; supporting information may be obtained by written request. The showing another Federal agency must make is carefully delineated in this bill. Our aim was to protect taxpayer submissions to the IRS to insure the system of voluntary compliance was not undermined. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight of the Internal Revenue Service, I intend to see this goal achieved.

During the past two Congresses, Senator NUNN has examined the issue of the appropriate use of tax information in nontax criminal investigations and introduced legislation to solve this problem. The introduction of this bill culminates a strong commitment on his part to improve law enforcement. He and his staff on the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations are to be commended for their hard work in this area. Chairman DOLE also deserves praise for forging this compromise among parties with widely divergent interests. His patient pursuit of compromise legislation and the efforts of his staff to achieve this goal have made the introduction of this bill possible. Senator ROTH and his staff on the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations have made valuable contributions to the legislation we are introducing today.

In short, this bill represents the agreement of a variety of Senators and Government agencies with very disparate interests. It is a reasonable approach to a difficult problem which merits serious consideration by all of my colleagues.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I hope the managers will accept the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator stated it accurately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN).

The amendment (UP No. 1151) was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1152

(Purpose: To allow the investment tax credit for soil and water conservation expenditures)

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ABDNOR, and Mr. KASTEN, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER), for himself, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. ABDNOR, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1152.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 225, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following new subsection:

(c) INVESTMENT CREDIT FOR SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION EXPENDITURES.—Paragraph (1) of section 48(a) (defining section 38 property) is amended—

(1) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (G) and inserting in lieu thereof ", or";

(2) by inserting after subparagraph (G) the following new subparagraph:

"(H) in the case of soil and water conservation expenditures (within the meaning of section 175(c)), that portion of such expenditures for the taxable year (other than that portion attributable to property which otherwise qualifies as section 38 property) which the taxpayer does not elect under section 175 to treat as expenses which are not chargeable to capital account.";

(3) by inserting "or (H)" after "subparagraph (F)" in the last sentence thereof; and

(4) by inserting ", or 7 years, respectively" after "growing period" in the last sentence thereof.

On page 225, line 20, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)".

On page 225, line 21, strike out "Subsection (a)" and insert in lieu thereof "Subsections (a) and (c)".

On page 225, line 22, strike out "subsection (a)" and insert in lieu thereof "subsections (a) and (c)".

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I have introduced an amendment to H.R. 4961, which would allow farmers to use the investment tax credit for soil and water conservation expenses. This amendment is similar to S. 569, a bill introduced by Senator JEPSEN and cosponsored by me and 27 of my colleagues.

Coming from a family farm, I am well aware that soil erosion is a major problem in America today, but due to the need to reduce Government spending, we must look for new methods to promote soil conservation. Currently, farmers may take a deduction for soil and water conservation expenses under section 175 of the IRS Code for not exceeding 25 percent of their gross income. There are also several Government programs to assist farmers in soil conservation practices, but they do not provide any financial incentives for farmers to install soil conservation measures. Farmers' investments in shelterbelts, terraces, and other conservation practices are expensive and do provide a return for several years.

The administration, and particularly the Office of Management and Budget, have proposed further reductions in soil conservation spending. These proposals have been criticized by Midwestern Governors and my colleague, Senator JEPSEN, at the Midwest Governors conference. With diminished funding for soil conservation programs and proposals to further reduce this funding, it is important that alternative soil conservation incentives be implemented. My amendment would provide some modest financial incentives to farmers by allowing them to receive an investment tax credit for soil conservation expenses not provided for under section 175. The cost of my amendment would be less than $11 million according to figures provided by the Joint Committee on Taxation. In the long run, it would increase revenues by increasing agricultural production.

Agriculture is the backbone of the American economy and is essential to improvements in our balance of trade, but soil erosion is threatening farm productivity. Over 5 million tons of topsoil are lost annually to erosion nationally and USDA studies estimate that at this rate, corn and soybean yields could be reduced by as much as 30 percent in the next 50 years as the fertility of the soil declines. When the Midwest was settled, there was an average of 30 inches of topsoil—but now we have less than 5 inches. With the current depressed farm economy, farmers cannot afford to take land out of production in order to install soil conservation measures without reasonable financial incentives. If American farmers are to reverse erosion trends in order to continue to feed the world's people, they must be given incentives to install soil conservation measures.

It is a well-accepted principle of our tax system that businesses should be encouraged to invest in new technology which will provide jobs and stimulate the economy. Should we not also encourage our farmer businessmen and businesswomen to invest in the renewal of land resources which provide our own citizens and many foreign consumers an abundance of agricultural products?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as a farmer and former member of the House Agriculture Committee, I have long been very concerned about the problems our country faces with soil erosion. I need not remind those present today that soil erosion presents one of our Nation's most serious long-term challenges. In 1977, about half of our 413 million acres of cropland were comprised of soils exposed to moderate, high, or very high risk of damage by sheet or rill erosion. This exposure has resulted in over 4 billion tons of soil lost yearly. In my home State of Iowa our farmers lose about 10 tons of topsoil per crop acre each year, which gives the State the great misfortune of ranking first in the Nation in soil erosion. Such loss of our vital resources is more than a threat to our farmers, but seriously threatens the Nation's future potential as a provider of food and fiber for our own people and for those around the world.

There is no need for me to belabor the point that we are suffering intolerable levels of soil erosion and that our future relies upon the resolution of the problem. What we need to decide is how we can turn this disastrous trend around—how can we best bring soil erosion within acceptable levels. Clearly, we are not suffering such huge losses for lack of effort—we have been fighting soil erosion for nearly 50 years and presently have over 30 Federal programs to assist soil conservation efforts by providing loans, cost-sharing funds, research, educational, and technical assistance. Yet with all this effort, we are still losing.

Some may argue that we have not directed enough money to the effort. I cannot argue with that, but the problem is that the Federal Government does not have all the money that it would take to bring erosion under control. Earlier this year, USDA Secretary Block pointed out that it would take $250 billion to bring erosion under control. It is plain that we do not have that kind of money during these times of severe budget constraints. But one of the things that we can do is make certain what money is expended for this effort is used in the most effective way available.

I believe that this has been one of our major problems—we have been spending money in a way that does not maximize conservation effort. This is why we need to try a different approach, and I firmly believe that tax credits for conservation expenditures could better help our work in curbing soil and water erosion.

I first began work on the idea of tax credits for soil conservation expenditures back in 1977 when I introduced the first bill providing such incentives for soil conservation purposes ever presented to Congress. During subsequent years, I continued my effort in this area. Needless to say, I was very pleased when I joined the Senate Finance Committee upon my arrival to the Senate last year because now I am a member of the key committee that can help me work for the enactment of my tax credit ideas.

Moreover, I believe that the idea of tax credits for soil conservation expenditures has come into its own time. Clearly, our past soil conservation efforts have been inadequate—the continued high rates of erosion across the country, particularly in my home State of Iowa, attest to this fact.

Some might wonder why we need tax credits when we already have tax deductions available for soil conservation efforts. The simple fact is that deductions do not provide as good of an incentive. They provide incentives of varying degree depending upon the taxpayer's tax bracket. A person in a higher tax bracket is far more likely to be able to take advantage of a deduction. Also, with the new tax breaks, these deductions will become even less attractive.

A tax credit, however, is a much stronger incentive, as well as a far more effective inducement for wider utilization because taxpayers are treated equally regardless of the size of the tax liability.

This provision is in true harmony with the philosophy of less Federal intervention. No new bureaucracy would be needed to administer the program. Government supervision over expenditures would be minimized since no new appropriations would be necessary. In short, this is the type of legislation that is most attractive to Americans today—it provides an incentive or inducement, but it does not allow the Government to interfere with the decision making process of the individual.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry. If the cost is negligible, then it would meet the standard we spelled out earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not able to answer such an inquiry.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER).

The amendment (UP No. 1152) was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1153

(Purpose: Striking the increase in the limitation on medical and dental expenses)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1153.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 204, line 13, strike out "FOR MEDICAL AND DENTAL EXPENSES AND".

On page 204, strike out lines 15 through 20, and the matter inserted between lines 20 and 21.

On page 204, line 21, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(b)".

On page 206, line 10, strike out "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be heard for 3 minutes in order that I might explain my amendment. It is a rather significant amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is the Senator going to ask for a rollcall vote?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, but I might say I would be very happy to withdraw that request——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum call in progress.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, can I ask the Senator from Minnesota to consent to 3 minutes of debate before we kill this amendment?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I do not know how many more we have.

Mr. DOLE. This is almost the last one.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee bill would trim two major medical expense deductions and thereby raise taxes for millions of elderly and middle-income Americans. My amendment would strike the committee's effort to scale back medical expense deductions and retain current law.

Under the committee bill, the total health insurance premium which can be deducted by an individual would be reduced to $100 from the current level of $150.

The committee would also raise the floor for deduction of medical expenses to 7 percent of adjusted gross income from today's 3-percent level.

These changes would raise about $4 billion. The bulk of that will come out of the pockets of elderly and middle-income taxpayers.

The taxes of 16 million Americans would rise an average of $114 if the Finance Committee proposals are adopted. Of these, 14 million earn less than $50,000 a year, and nearly 4½ million taxpayers in the $20,000 to $30,000 income category would experience a tax hike of $98 a year.

The changes would be most devastating for the elderly, particularly the low-income elderly.

Almost 65 percent of all dollars itemized for medical expenses by people over the age of 65 are deducted by those with an average adjusted gross income of less than $20,000.

Furthermore, total medical expenses in excess of 3 percent represent 20 percent of total itemized deductions for persons over 65.

The medical expense deduction is one of the Tax Code's few provisions which clearly aids the average taxpayer.

Mr. President, there have been no abuses of the medical deductions. There is not rampant taxpayer fraud. The current law simply recognizes the fact that many persons run up enormous medical expenses which are not covered by health insurance and provides a cushion for these taxpayers.

The committee's provision appears to be a handy way to raise $4 billion. But I would suggest that before we start raiding this area, we close some of the truly egregious loopholes that encourage tax abuses.

Surely, we can find $4 billion elsewhere. All we need is the courage to take on some of the special interests, rather than taking the easy road of cutting back on one of the few tax breaks enjoyed by those without powerful lobbyists to represent them.

What we are really talking about here is whether or not we are going to place upon middle and poor Americans the cost of their medical care and not permit them to deduct in excess of 3 percent as presently the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let us have silence in the Chamber, please, so the Senator can be heard.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is whether or not we are going to take away the $150 expenses that are deductible and reduce that amount to $100.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays. I think the amendment speaks for itself. It is a question of putting back the law as it presently is.

Mr. DOLE. Medical expenses are a highly emotional issue. But we must keep our heads, examine the facts, and then decide whether current law really accomplishes what we all feel it should accomplish.

We are all concerned with providing better medical care to the American people, especially for low- and middle-income families. The fact is, a tax deduction is an inefficient and inequitable way to implement that concern. Tax deductions are never worth more than 50 percent of an expenditure. Moreover, they are only worth that much to the wealthy taxpayers in high tax brackets. The lower income taxpayers do not really benefit from this deduction nearly as much as the wealthy. And the wealthy, attracted by the deductibility of certain so-called medical expenses, often take deductions for frivolous or questionable expenses.

This deduction does not really help the poor or lower income taxpayer pay for important medical expenses. It does subsidize many questionable expenditures.

For example: Clarinet lessons to correct teeth defects; contact lens insurance; a reclining chair; face lifts, and other cosmetic surgery; elastic stockings; hair transplants for a balding 24-year-old man; and organic foods.

Public and private health insurance now covers all but 5 to 8 percent of the American people. Most of the uncovered are from lower income families who generally do not itemize deductions, and thus do not benefit from this deduction. Even if they do itemize, the value of the deduction is very small.

The medical deduction has been allowed since 1942. For most of the last 40 years, the deduction was subject to a low ceiling, as well as a floor ranging from 3 to 5 percent. With the committee's amendment, the medical deduction rule will still be much more liberal than the rule in the 1954 Tax Code. That rule placed a $5,000 ceiling on medical deductions, together with a 3-percent floor. The result was no tax relief for catastrophic medical expenses. The committee amendment has no ceiling; thus, the floor simply limits the deduction to genuinely burdensome medical expenditures.

A 7-percent floor is not too restrictive. For a couple earning $20,000, it means they can deduct expenses over $1,400. This is lower than the $2,000 threshold contained in Senator LONG's proposal to provide Federal catastrophic health insurance. This threshold is fairer to low-income families, because it varies directly with income.

This deduction was placed in the tax law when private and public health insurance was rare. In 1945, only 32 million Americans were covered by private health insurance, and there was almost no Federal health insurance. In 1980, more than 186 million Americans were covered by private health insurance, and many more are covered by medicare and medicaid.

Today, between 92 and 95 percent of the population is covered by health insurance. The medical expense deduction does not effectively help the remaining 5 to 8 percent who are not covered. Perhaps we should review proposals to expand Federal health insurance programs. But a tax deduction for medical expenses is not really a solution to the problems faced by uncovered individuals.

The medical expense deduction serves only one function well. It reduces tax liability substantially when catastrophic medical expenditures reduce a family's ability to pay taxes. For this function, raising the floor is an appropriate change.

The medical expense deduction is very inefficient, since IRS bureaucrats and tax lawyers are not expert in determining what sorts of medical and health expenditures should be deductible to further sound health policy. An example of questionable tax and health policy is found in an IRS ruling that allows a medical expense deduction for hair transplants and electrolysis, but disallows amounts paid for tattoos and ear piercing. Are these items really distinguishable? Should hair transplants and electrolysis be subsidized by the Federal Government? Do we really want the IRS and the Tax Court spending their time and resources on these issues? I ask unanimous consent to include this ruling in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the ruling was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVISED RULE 82-111, JUNE 1, 1982, INTERNAL REVENUE BULLETIN

SECTION 213.—MEDICAL, DENTAL, ETC., EXPENSES (26 CFR 1.213-1: MEDICAL, DENTAL, ETC., EXPENSES)

Medical expenses; hair transplants; hair removal through electrolysis; tattoos; ear piercing. Expenditures for hair transplants performed by a doctor and expenditures for removal of hair through electrolysis performed by a licensed technician are amounts paid for medical care expenses. Expenditures for tattoos and ear piercing are not amounts paid for medical care.

Revised rule 82-111

Issue

Are expenditures made under the situations described below amounts paid for medical care as defined in section 213(e) of the Internal Revenue Code?

Facts

Situation 1.—The taxpayer pays for hair transplants performed on the taxpayer by a dermatologist or plastic surgeon.

Situation 2.—The taxpayer pays for hair removal through electrolysis performed on the taxpayer by a state licensed technician.

Situation 3.—The taxpayer pays for a tattoo inscribed on the taxpayer's arm by a "tattoo artist."

Situation 4.—The taxpayer pays for an ear piercing procedure performed by a licensed physician.

Law

Section 213(a) of the Code provides that there shall be allowed as a deduction the amount by which the amount of the expenses paid during the taxable year for medical care of the taxpayer exceeds three percent of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income.

Section 213(e)(1) of the Code provides that the term "medical care" means amounts paid for the diagnosis, cure, mitigation, treatment, or prevention of disease, or for the purpose of affecting any structure or function of the body.

Section 1.213-1(e)(1)(ii) of the Income Tax Regulations provides that amounts paid for operations or treatments affecting any portion of the body are deemed to be for the purpose of affecting any structure or function of the body and are therefore paid for medical care. See also Rev. Rul. 76-332, 1976-2 C.B. 81; Rev. Rul. 73-603, 1973-2 C.B. 76; and Rev. Rul. 73-201, 1973-1 C.B. 140.

Analysis

Situation 1.—In performing a hair transplant, a dermatologist or surgeon removes a hair and its follicle from the fringes of the scalp and transplants it into a bald area on top of the head. The operation requires the transplanting of many tiny plugs of tissue, including the skin and subcutaneous layers. In order for the procedure to succeed, the implant must "take" in much the same way as any other graft must survive in its new location. See R. Rothenber, The Complete Surgical Code 109 (1974).

In Mattes v. Commissioner, 77 T.C. 650 (1981), page 5, this Bulletin, the Tax Court concluded that because the scalp is a part of the body, the transplantation of the taxpayer's hair from one portion of the scalp to another through a surgical procedure certainly affected a structure of the body. The Tax Court further held that the hair transplantation undergone by the taxpayer was a treatment for a physical defect within the meaning of "medical care" under section 1.213-1(e)(1)(ii) of the regulations.

Situation 2.—Hair removal through electrolysis is a form of epilation by electric current. A fine needle with a rounded tip is attached to an electrode and inserted into the hair follicle parallel to and touching the hair approximately three to five millimeters below the surface of the skin to the base of the follicle. The electric current concentrates at the tip of the needle and is transmitted to the cells of the hair bulb, thereby permanently destroying the hair root or papilla. See E. Epstein, Skin Surgery 216 (2d ed. 1962).

Because this operation penetrates the entire length of the follicle and destroys living tissue, it affects a structure of the body, the skin and subcutaneous layers.

Situation 3.—Tattooing is done by pricking the skin with coloring matter. Generally a form of dye is injected into the skin to represent various figures and designs using a power driven multiple spiked tool. See G. Lewis, Practical Dermatology 311 (2d ed.)

Tattooing, in contrast to hair transplants and hair removal through electrolysis, is not a procedure that affects a structure or function of the body. It is merely a method of pigmenting the skin without affecting the subcutaneous layers.

Situation 4.—Ear piercing is generally done by piercing the earlobe with a large needle after deadening the area to be pierced. After the ear is pierced, generally, gold or stainless steel earrings are attached until the ear heals. Earrings must be worn regularly after healing to prevent the hole from closing through natural tissue growth. Without regular wear, the hole will grow shut.

Ear piercing, because it is a superficial procedure, and because of its impermanent effect does not affect a function or structure of the body within the meaning of section 213 of the Code and the regulations thereunder.

Holdings

Situation 1.—Expenditures by the taxpayer for hair transplants are amounts paid for medical care as defined in section 213(e) of the Code.

Situation 2.—Expenditures by the taxpayer for hair removal through electrolysis are amounts paid for medical care as defined in section 213(e) of the Code.

89-059 O-86-22 (Pt.13)

Situation 3.—Expenditures by the taxpayer for tattooing are not amounts paid for medical care as defined in section 213(e) of the Code.

Situation 4.—Expenditures by the taxpayer for ear piercing are not amounts paid for medical care as defined in section 213(e) of the Code.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. We lowered it from 10 to 7, and the Senator from Kansas would go further but we do not have the money. We intend to go further in conference.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I appreciate the efforts of the Senator from Kansas to move in the right direction. I think we have not gone far enough. I appreciate his efforts in attempting to do that. In spite of that, it is my feeling that we ought not to put this burden on poor- and middle-class Americans.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, would the Senator be satisfied with a voice vote? It is after 3 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I will not be satisfied with a voice vote, but I would be very happy if the majority leader wants to limit the rollcall vote to 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I cannot do that. Senators are off the floor and it takes time to get them here. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 51, as follows:

So Mr. METZENBAUM'S amendment (UP No. 1153) was rejected.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1154

(Purpose: To amend the Tax Reform Act of 1969 with respect to the application of the excess business holding provisions to private foundations)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA) for himself and Mr. CRANSTON, an unprinted amendment numbered 1154.

At the appropriate place add the following new section:

SECTION 1. APPLICATION OF DIVESTITURE REQUIREMENTS.

Paragraph (4) of subsection (1) of section 101 of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraphs:

"(D) Subject to the provisions of subparagraph (E), the 15-year period described in section 4943(c)(4)(B)(ii) for the disposition by any private foundation of excess business holdings shall be suspended for an additional 5-year period, beginning when the 15-year period described in section 4943(c)(4)(B)(ii) would end but for this subparagraph, with respect to holdings in an insured institution (as defined in section 408(a)(1)(A) of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1730a(a)(1)(A))) and in each savings and loan holding company (as defined in section 408(a)(1)(D) of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1730a(a)(1)(D))) that owns stock of such insured institution (or that owns stock of a savings and loan holding company that owns stock of such insured institution), if, on May 26, 1969—

"(i) the private foundation and disqualified persons with respect to the private foundation (as defined in section 4946(a)(1)) together would have owned directly at least 80 percent of the voting stock of such insured institution had each such savings and loan holding company been dissolved on that date and its assets distributed to its shareholders;

"(ii) at least 80 percent of the fair market value of the assets of the private foundation was represented by its ownership of voting or nonvoting stock of such insured institution and of one or more such savings and loan holding companies; and

"(iii) the outstanding principal balance of residential loans held by such insured institution exceeded $2,000,000,000.

"(E) The suspension of the 15-year period provided in subparagraph (D) shall apply only if and for so long as—

"(i) from and after the end of such 15-year period, the private foundation shall have irrevocably divested itself, its disqualified persons, and its related and subordinate parties (as defined in section 672(c)) of the power to vote such of its voting stock of such insured institution and of each such savings and loan holding company that, in each case, would constitute excess business holdings but for subparagraph (D); and

"(ii) by the end of each 1-year period following the end of such 15-year period, the number of shares of voting stock of such insured institution, and of each such savings and loan holding company, owned directly or indirectly by the private foundation, is not, in each case, more than (I) the number of such shares that does not constitute excess business holdings (determined without regard to subparagraph (D)), plus (II) 10 percent of the number of such shares that would have constituted excess business holdings at the end of the 15-year period but for subparagraph (D), multiplied by the number of years remaining in the additional 5-year period described in subparagraph (D).

"(F) The savings and loan holding companies described in subparagraph (D) shall be deemed to be business enterprises for purposes of chapter 42.

"(G) The divestiture of the power to vote voting stock, pursuant to subparagraph (E)(i), shall not cause the stock in question to be considered as other than voting stock held by the private foundation.".

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendment made by this Act shall be effective as of May 26, 1969.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may have 1 minute to explain his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I am proposing with Senator CRANSTON, an amendment which is similar to two provisions in H.R. 4961. This amendment amends section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code to provide the Ahmanson Foundation with a limited extension of the time within which it must dispose of stock holdings in H. F Ahmanson Co., the holding company of Home Savings of America, the largest savings and loan association in the United States. This amendment will allow the Ahmanson Foundation to avoid sales of H. F. Ahmanson stock at significantly depressed prices. I understand this amendment has been cleared on both sides. I urge its adoption. It has been cleared by Senator CRANSTON, Senator METZENBAUM, and by my colleagues on the Republican side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment UP. 1154 was agreed to.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1155

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. EXON. Has not the time expired for consideration of these amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments are in order, but they must be disposed of without debate.

Without objection, the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1155.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 534, line 21 strike "during" and insert in lieu thereof "before the close of the".

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 1 minute to explain the amendment.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read. It works on both sides of the street.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 534, line 21, strike "during" and insert in lieu thereof "before the close of the".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, may I have half a minute to explain specifically that this amendment modifies the requirement that State and local governments——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, regular order.

Mr. STEVENS. Let him have the minute. It will take 15 minutes to have a vote. We need at least a minute or 2 minutes on each one of these in spite of the fact that time has expired. Fair is fair.

Mr. EXON. Point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. EXON. Are the rules of the Senate that the minority whip is allowed to debate when others are not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nobody is permitted debate.

Mr. STEVENS. The minority whip is not debating.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAYAKAWA addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). The Senator from California.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am given to understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum call in process.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from California.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am given to understand that Senator LONG and others on the Democratic side have given their consent——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, we cannot hear the Senator, what is he saying?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment, along with Senators CRANSTON, D'AMATO, HAWKINS, and MURKOWSKI to correct a problem created by a requirement in this bill that will cost the State of California $4 million and will have a similar impact on many other States. Specifically, this amendment modifies the requirement that State and local governments notify during the month of January, taxpayers that any refund they may have received in the previous tax year is taxable as income to the Federal Government. Because the bill requires notification only during January, States will have to make a separate mailing to all taxpayers, at considerable cost. In mailing fees alone, this provision will cost California taxpayers, as I said before, $4 million.

This amendment simply allows States to notify taxpayers sometime prior to the end of January. With this degree of flexibility, States could enclose the notice with the refund check, or with other tax information mailings. Thus, States would not be required to incur additional mailing expenses, but the intent of the bill would be met.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment (UP No. 1155) was agreed to.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1156

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. I thank the Chair. I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1156:

On page 460, strike out line 5 and all that follows through line 20.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has suggested the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wonder if we might have unanimous consent that we have 2 minutes on each side on this amendment.

Mr. EXON. Reserving the right to object, could we have some indication as to how long we are going to proceed under these conditions? It seems very strange for a fairly new Member of the body; we are passing laws and nobody knows what they are doing. Maybe that is customary, but it seems a little unusual to me.

May I please inquire of the manager of the bill as to how many amendments are left?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, this is the last known amendment except the Senator from Kansas has one to raise the corporate minimum from 15 percent to 20 percent. That picks up $800 million. We would need only $2 billion more.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, this amendment seeks to strike a provision from the bill which the Senator from Colorado interprets to permit the deductibility of certain foreign illegal payments for bribes. As the Senator from Colorado reads pages 164 and 165 of the committee report, payments made illegally to foreign governments or to foreign interests in some circumstances are deductible on presumably American corporate income tax forms. This amendment would strike that provision and not permit those deductions.

I hope my colleagues will support this amendment.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the provision in the act now, which the Senator from Colorado seeks to strike, permits the deductibility of payments that are permitted under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act that exists under our law now. These are permissible under our Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. This conforms the Internal Revenue Code with that. It would permit those payments to be a deductible item.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield.

Mr. HART. Can the Senator tell me what the phrase on page 165 of the committee report, "grease payments," means? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHAFEE. That is an acceptable term that is used to refer to payments for ministerial or clerical duties, nondiscriminator duties performed by lower level government employees. For example, a payment to a customs officer to speed up processing one's goods through customs.

Mr. HART. Is that why it is in quotes?

Mr. CHAFEE. Those payments are to make things move faster, and it all translates into jobs for Americans. [Laughter.]

This is a bill that favors the working men and working women of America.

Mr. DOLE. And other countries.

Mr. CHAFEE. It has been approved by Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I rest my case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I recommend that the amendment by the Senator from Colorado be defeated, on behalf of the working men and women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HART. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I withdraw my request.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. All those in favor signify by saying "aye."

All those oppose signify by saying "nay."

The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON: I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 51, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Goldwater	Inouye	Weicker

So Mr. HART's amendment (UP No. 1156) was rejected.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 2 minutes to explain what the problem is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are right now about $2.8 billion shy of the mark mandated by the budget resolution.

I have a number of amendments that I think could satisfy that. I have one that is precisely $2.8 billion and one that I think might be acceptable and I intend to offer that amendment and if it can be agreed upon that would end it.

It would simply provide that only 50 percent of business meals are deductible when the meals are consumed other than on travel status. That is, all expenses would be deductible if the individual is away from home; but only half would be deductible.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1157

I send that amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1157:

On page 228, after line 20, insert the following:

SEC. 210. DEDUCTION FOR BUSINESS MEALS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of section 274(e) (relating to deductions for entertainment, etc.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no deduction shall be allowed under this chapter for 50 percent of the expenses (other than expenses in connection with travel away from home) otherwise described in the preceding sentence."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I could have 1 additional minute I could further explain the amendment.

The present law treatment of meal and entertainment expenses encourages taxpayers to charge personal expenses to the Treasury.

Unfairness and abuse result under present law because meal and entertainment deductions are allowed for expenses that are essentially for the personal benefit and enjoyment of individuals who do not include any amount in income as a result of the expenditures.

Finally, it should be remembered that the personal benefits of meal and entertainment deductions accrue largely to upper income taxpayers.

I just suggest that this is a good amendment.

If one talks about more equity, here is a chance to do a little equity in the middle of the night.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator from Kansas offered an amendment which reduced the percentage of reduction from 10 to 9 percent the third year of the tax cut, my understanding is that is approximately $3 billion and would accomplish the same; is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. I think that is accurate, but I would not dare do that. [Laughter.] I might say the Boston Globe endorsed this amendment last week. [Laughter.]

Mr. HART. Mr. President, would the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not had an opportunity to examine the amendment.

The Chair is not aware that there is a provision in the bill dealing with deductions for meals. Apparently this introduces new matter into the bill, and therefore, would be nongermane and the point of order of the Senator from Louisiana is sustained.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KENNEDY. On whose time?

Mr. DOLE. I do not care.

Mr. KENNEDY. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Kansas suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOLE. Is a quorum call not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1158

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a committee amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, is the chairman speaking on behalf of, or is he authorized by, a majority of the committee to submit this amendment?

Mr. DOLE. The answer is "yes." I have contacted myself and 10 others; 11 members of 20.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And 11 have so authorized?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), on behalf of the Committee on Finance, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1158:

On page 228, after line 20, insert the following:

SEC. 210. DEDUCTION FOR BUSINESS MEALS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of section 274(e) (relating to deductions for entertainment, etc.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no deduction shall be allowed under this chapter for 50 percent of the expenses (other than expenses in connection with travel away from home) otherwise described in the preceding sentence."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will just take 15 seconds. This is a matter that has been voted on time and time again. It has been overwhelmingly defeated. Tonight the Senate voted to protect the waiters from what was in the committee bill and to protect the restaurant owners. This pending amendment will hurt the waiters and restaurant owners more than what the Senate voted to save them from.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I could take 15 seconds to make the argument that this amendment benefits upper income taxpayers. It raises the $2.8 billion that we need to meet our budget requirements. I hope the amendment might be adopted.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DECONCINI. Is this amendment germane to the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment is a committee amendment and sets the parameters for germaneness and, therefore, is germane per se.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, will the chairman yield for a question? I want to ask if it is not true that if the Senate were to vote to defer the third year of the tax cut for only those taxpayers whose incomes are in excess of $150,000 a year, would that not yield approximately $3 billion, which is almost exactly the amount the chairman has indicated is lacking here?

Mr. DOLE. I am not certain. I would have to look that up while we have the rollcall on this. I would be glad to check.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the information I have is that that is true, and I suggest it for the chairman's consideration as a way out of this impasse. There have been 4 days of rhetoric here on all sides about how much we want to do something for little people and how much we are not just for the wealthy.

I repeat again, this would defer the third year of the tax cut only for those taxpayers whose incomes are in excess of $150,000 a year. That would raise $3 billion in income and would break the impasse so we could vote on the bill and go home.

Mr. DOLE. That is probably what this amendment does right here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order for me to propose this as a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is a second-degree amendment and the substitute will be a third-degree amendment and would not be in order.

Mr. DECONCINI. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the Chair advises this is a committee amendment. Are there rules that govern the notice of meeting of the committee and when did it meet, can the Chair advise?

Mr. DOLE. Under the rules of the Committee on Finance, we do not have to meet. We just have to find and poll our members.

Mr. DECONCINI. There are no rules for meeting of the Finance Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling is that a committee amendment can be offered on behalf of the committee by a majority thereof without a meeting.

Mr. DECONCINI. Without any formal meeting or notice of meeting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HART. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Kansas could state whether the business entertainment expenses affected by this amendment are the same business entertainment expenses that would have been reduced by an amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado some 2 months ago, the revenues from which would have been applied to the school lunch program, reducing the deductibility from 100 percent to 70 percent at that time? Are those the same business entertainment expenses that this amendment applies to?

Mr. DOLE. I do not recall that amendment, but I believe that both amendments addressed certain business meal deductions.

Mr. HART. I raise the question since I think a number of people, particularly on the other side of the aisle, voted against that amendment at that time. That was to reduce not to 50 percent but from 170 percent.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) is necessarily absent.

Thr PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 40, as follows:

EXCISE TAX EXEMPTION FOR CERTAIN HELICOPTERS ENGAGED IN QUALIFIED FUNCTIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would like to make some additional comments on sections 281(b) and 282(a) of this bill and the exemptions for certain helicopter uses from the relevant excise taxes that would be imposed upon them.

Specifically, the section on fuel taxes reads in part:

No tax shall be imposed under this section on any liquid sold for use in, or used in, a helicopter for the purpose of—

(1) transporting individuals, equipment, or supplies in the exploration for, or the development or removal of, natural resources, or

(2) the planting, cultivation, cutting, or transportation of, or caring for, trees (including logging operations).

but only if the helicopter does not take off from, or land at, a facility eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, or otherwise use services provided pursuant to title IV of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 during such use.

Essentially the same qualified purpose test is also used in section 2826 for the air transportation tax.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated the purpose for these excise tax exemptions is because timber and natural resource operations are very important to many of the States in our Union, including my own. These aircraft do not use federally funded facilities in their operations.

However, the committee report language relating to this fuel tax exemption is somewhat unclear on some of the fine points concerning how this exemption is to be applied. For purposes of clarity in understanding my concerns, I ask that the committee commentary on the helicopter fuel tax exemption be printed at this point in my remarks.

The material follows:

EXEMPTION FOR FUELS USED IN CERTAIN HELICOPTERS

The committee bill also provides for an exemption (via a refund or credit) for fuels used in helicopters when the helicopters are used for certain qualified purposes, if the helicopter does not (1) take off from or land at a facility eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, as amended, or (2) otherwise use Federal airway system facilities or services.

Specifically, the fuels taxes will not be imposed when the helicopter is used for (1) transporting individuals, equipment or supplies in the exploration for, or the development or removal of, natural resources, or (2) the planting, cultivation, cutting, or transportation of, or caring for, trees (including logging operations). For example, fuels used by helicopters which are transporting persons engaged in the exploration for petroleum will qualify for exemption from the fuels tax under the natural resources exemption, when departing from, or arriving at, heliports or airports not eligible for ADAP assistance; however, if in its flight pattern, a helicopter follows FAA air navigation signals, the fuel used in that flight is not exempt from the excise tax. The committee intends that this exemption will cover helicopters used in transporting persons and property from the Outer Continental Shelf (within the meaning of section 2 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1331)) when engaged in natural resources operations, and when the requirements concerning nonuse of the FAA system are satisfied.

The forestry exemption covers fuels used in tree farming and timber harvesting activities. This is intended to include, for example, fuels used by helicopters engaged in fire control or insect control of trees, as well as in tree cultivation and in logging operations.

The exemptions from the fuels tax provided by this provision apply only to fuels used in the qualifying activities. If fuel is delivered into the fuel supply tank of a qualified helicopter and such fuel is used partly for qualified purposes and partly for nonqualified purposes, the tax will apply to that portion of the fuel which is used for the non-qualified purposes. In addition, the committee intends that the rules and regulations under sections 4041 and 6427 will govern the application of these exceptions. Thus, present law registration, refund, and credit procedures will apply.

Mr. STEVENS. In the committee commentary the statement is made that—

The Committee intends that this exemption will cover helicopters used in transporting persons and property from the Outer Continental Shelf . . . when engaged in natural resource operations, and when the requirements concerning the non-use of the FAA system are satisfied.

Frankly, my concern, Mr. President, is that by way of example the committee may unintentionally provide the IRS the opportunity to severely limit the scope of this exemption.

I understand my distinguished colleagues, the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Oregon, also share my concerns. They both continue to have a substantial interest in this provision since reviewing it in the Finance Committee markup, and I wonder if my friend from Louisiana would mind an inquiry from me on this section.

Mr. LONG. I would be happy to share my thoughts with the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. It is, is it not, the intent of the committee that any helicopter engaged in natural resources exploration, development, or removal be exempt from the applicable excise taxes as long as they do not utilize FAA or ADAP facilities or services? In other words, these exemptions apply not just to those helicopters going to and from OCS sites, is that correct?

Mr. LONG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. And am I correct in stating that while the helicopters are engaging in the qualified purpose, their continuous flight plans, exploration areas, or operation sites are irrelevant as long as they do not involve ADAP FAA facilities or services?

Mr. LONG. The Senator is again correct.

Mr. STEVENS. Assume for a moment a helicopter takes off from an ADAP or FAA facility for an extended 3-month exploratory mission in the Alaska bush. Assume also that it is on a continuous flight plan for that 3-month period before it returns to the ADAP or FAA facility. In between, for the many months that it performs its qualified purpose, it uses no other ADAP or FAA facilities or services whatsoever. It obtains its fuel from non-ADAP facilities. Must the helicopter's owners pay the fuel tax for all the refuelings that never involved ADAP or FAA facilities or services? Must it also pay the transportation tax?

Mr. LONG. No; the intent of the section is only to make nonexempt the fuel that has a logical connection with the use of FAA or ADAP facilities or services. In the case you present, it is my judgment that the first full refueling of the aircraft when out in the bush would be the start of fuel tax exemption. On the inbound flight at the end of the 3-month period, the point of departure for the ADAP or FAA facility would be the termination point for the helicopter's fuel tax exemption. I wish to point out that while not every case will be clear when exempt or nonexempt status exists, it is not the intent of this section to penalize extended missions for helicopters which only for a small part of a continuous several week or several month flight plan used an FAA or ADAP facility to start or terminate their operations. I would like to add that where applicable, the air transportation tax should be similarly apportioned between exempt and nonexempt portions of the flight.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator, and have only one other question. When using the term "natural resources" does this also include hard rock mining?

Mr. LONG. It most certainly does.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for his insight and courtesy, and now turn to my good friend from Oregon on some questions I have concerning timber operations in the context of this provision.

I ask the Senator from Oregon if the same ADAP/FAA facilities or services test that has just been described for natural resources as a qualified purpose is any different from that which would be applied to timber operations.

Mr. PACKWOOD. No, it is not, but I want to thank the Senator for giving me the opportunity to comment on the problems he has presented today, particularly with respect to the extended mission scenario that has been discussed.

In Oregon, and I suspect it is much the same anywhere that helicopters are used in timber operations, helicopters may be serviced at an ADAP or FAA facility. They then are assigned to several weeks or months in remote areas where they have no further contact with these facilities. Clearly, my colleagues are right in pointing out that the fuel tax is not to follow them for extended missions simply because they depart or return from the facility. The tax should be apportioned, as was pointed out.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank my good friend from Oregon for his views, and for further clarifying matters for me. I now ask the distinguished manager of the bill for the majority one simple question, and that is whether everything he has heard on this matter is a correct interpretation of the committee's work, as amended?

Mr. DOLE. I have listened carefully to the distinguished Senators' comments on this section and find them to be entirely accurate.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank all my colleagues who have helped me in focusing on these sections so that the Department of the Treasury may be clear in our intent. I yield my time back to the distinguished floor manager for the majority.

FUEL TAX ON HELICOPTER OPERATIONS IN THE U.S. TUNA INDUSTRY

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I wish to clarify a question of congressional intent with my colleague, Senator DOLE, the chairman of the Finance Committee, relating to the provisions in this tax bill providing an exemption from the proposed tax increase on aviation fuels. The language of this exemption, contained in section 281(b) of the bill, I believe applies to fuel consumed by helicopters that are used by the U.S. tuna fleet based in my State.

The bill proposes a tax increase on aviation fuel for noncommercial uses, raising the 3 cent tax on gasoline fuels to 12 cents and the 7 cent tax on nongasoline fuels to 14 cents. Section 281(b) provides an exemption for certain helicopter uses, that is, for helicopters used in the timber industry, and it reads in relevant part, as follows:

No tax shall be imposed under this section on any liquid sold for use in, or used in, a helicopter for the purpose of—

(1) transporting individuals, equipment, or supplies in the exploration for, or the development or removal of, natural resources,

but only if the helicopter does not take off from, or land at, a facility eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, or otherwise use services provided pursuant to title IV of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 during such use.

The exemption is aimed at easing the otherwise increased tax burden on our natural resources industries that are suffering during these economically difficult times. The U.S. tuna industry, unfortunately, is facing its most serious economic difficulties in over 50 years. Plants have closed in the homeport of the tuna vessels, San Diego, and nearly 50 vessels sit idle in that port, some waiting for weeks to unload their catches. Warehouses are overstocked and foreign imports this year will likely double the 10-percent share of the market they captured in 1981. The fleet needs this exemption if it hopes to remain competitive during the next few years.

Under the exemption in section 281(b), helicopter fuels are not subject to the tax increase if two tests are satisfied. First, the helicopter must be used in exploring for, developing, or removing natural resources. Sixty U.S.-flag tuna vessels are equipped with helicopters. These aircraft serve as long-range eyes for the vessel as it searches thousands of square miles of open ocean for schools of the wide-ranging tuna, a fairly abundant natural resource caught by the fleet in the south, central, and eastern Pacific Ocean as well as in the Atlantic. The helicopters carry trained observers who then guide the fishing vessels to the fish. Obviously, the use of these helicopters fits test No. 1 under the proposed exemption.

The second requirement is that the helicopters not use airport facilities eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970 or FAA airport services. The tuna fleet helicopters meet this test as well. They take off and land on platforms atop the superstructure of the vessels and are guided by radio beacons and radios from the vessels. Obviously, they can rely on no FAA facilities when they operate in the middle of the world's oceans. Only incidentally, when using land facilities for repair or service, would they use FAA navigation aids and services. When fishing they are on their own.

For these reasons, I wish to clarify with the chairman of the Finance Committee the intent that helicopters used by the U.S. tuna fleet in its tuna fishing operations be accorded the exemption in section 281(b).

Mr. DOLE. I concur with the Senator from California in his analysis of section 281(b). Clearly, the tuna fleet's helicopters are eligible to make use of the exemption under the facts you outlined.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator for his views and assistance on this question.●

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, we face many complicated questions today concerning a complex tax bill. Before we conclude our consideration of this bill, I would like to raise a question that I believe deserves further thought and exploration, if not today then at some point in the future. That question concerns the exemption of two private foundations from the excess business holdings provision of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 required private foundations to divest themselves of excess business holdings within a period of 10, 15, or 20 years. Many worthy foundations are now facing the divestiture deadline. But two such foundations—one of which owns all the voting stock in a resort hotel, and another with voting stock in a corporation operating a major newspaper would be exempted under section 292 of this bill from the divestiture requirement.

Because forced selling of stock in profitable corporations can be disadvantageous to both charitable organizations and the communities they serve, this issue should not be considered lightly. But if the need for such an exemption applies to the two foundations in question, we must ask whether it applies equally to other foundations as well. And if such an exemption is not called for in other cases, perhaps we should examine more closely whether it is called for in the two cases at hand.

Now is not the time to slow these deliberations to ponder this question. But in the days ahead, as both Houses of Congress have more time to ask both the bigger and smaller questions about this tax bill, this issue should be among those studied more thoroughly.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, before the passage of this bill, I wish to make several comments with regard to the mergers and acquisitions section of this bill.

The mergers and acquisitions section of this bill seeks to address and resolve important tax policy issues affecting corporate acquisitions. While I agree with the objective of the bill that the tax system should neither encourage nor discourage corporate takeovers, I am deeply concerned that the bill's provisions will substantially affect many important transactions unrelated to corporate acquisitions.

Specifically, I believe there are some unintended and extremely damaging consequences of the sweeping provisions in the bill which effectively repeal the traditional tax treatment of partial liquidations. It has been a fundamental element of our tax treatment of corporations and shareholders, at least since the Revenue Act of 1924, that shareholders receiving property in a partial liquidation are entitled to capital gain treatment and that, except for recapture, there is no double taxation upon a partial liquidation. It is my understanding that this provision imposes a double tax in the case of all partial liquidations and denies capital gain treatment at the shareholder level in some transactions that have traditionally been partial liquidations—that is corporate contractions. The adverse effects of these changes on small- and medium-size businesses will be substantial and are neither necessary nor clearly justified to solve tax avoidance problems.

Similarly, the pro rata distribution of assets constituting a separate trade or business in a partial liquidation, with the shareholders continuing to hold and operate such assets in partnership form, without sale by them, can serve important business purposes. It may even be an antitakeover measure. The shareholders pay tax on such a distribution. It is by no means clear that gain should also be recognized at the corporate level, with double taxation consequences, in such a case.

This measure also substantially changes the tax consequences of stock redemptions and the purchase by a company of the stock beyond what is necessary to prevent any tax avoidance that has been identified. I believe these unnecessarily broad changes will have very unsettling and unforeseeable consequences. They will add more complexity to our already overly complex tax system.

Consequently, I believe that we will have to revisit these provisions again simply because the results and implications of these provisions require more careful and thoughtful consideration. The Senate Finance Committee did not hold hearings on this issue until after the markup of this tax bill, and during the hearing, Treasury clearly and purposefully misrepresented the facts and their intent in advising the Members of the implications of the provisions in this bill which was drafted with their assistance.

In summary, it is clear that the proposed corrections are wholly disproportionate to the perceived abuses and this new legislation will unfairly impact on a countless number of "legitimate" transactions.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD testimony that was given by Mr. Herbert L. Camp on behalf of the New York State Bar Association tax section. It provides detailed comments on these provisions as well as suggestions not only to improve, but to simplify the law as well.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HERBERT L. CAMP

My name is Herbert L. Camp. I am Co-Chairman of the Committee on Corporations of the Tax Section of the New York State Bar Association. The Tax Section has over 2,800 members, all of whom are lawyers with a professional interest in taxation. They include practicing lawyers, judges, professors of law, corporate counsel, and officials and employees of the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service.

I am pleased to testify with respect to S. 2687 (the "Bill"), introduced by Senator Danforth, concerning certain tax aspects of corporate takeovers. The Bill is substantially identical to H.R. 6725, introduced by Mr. Stark on June 28, 1982, and is similar to H.R. 6295, previously introduced by Mr. Stark.

I would like to comment particularly on Title II of the Bill, dealing with proposed new section 338 of the Internal Revenue Code (the "Code"), and Sections 101 and 102 of the Bill, dealing with, respectively, partial liquidations and redemptions using appreciated property.

I. GENERAL

The Tax Section is in favor of parts of the Bill which seek to abolish certain provisions of the tax law which, perhaps contrary to Congress' intention, may unduly facilitate certain corporate acquisitions. The Tax Section is opposed, however, to enactment without further study of those parts of the Bill which go beyond the correction of those perceived abuses. The Bill in its present form contains many complicated provisions. There is a significant risk that the Bill, if enacted without change, will produce an unworkable set of rules which the Congress will find necessary to delay pending further study, as has happened repeatedly in the case of section 382 of the Code (involving loss carryovers).

Congress should, we believe, note the example of the Installment Sales Revision Act of 1980, which most agree, was a significant improvement in the tax law. That Act took over one year to approve, and was a single-purpose bill. The present Bill is in distinct contrast to that situation in that it is to be taken up as part of a broad revenue raising proposal, under intense time pressure, and without the deliberate study and reflection of the professional community. The result will, we fear, not be improvement of the tax law, but only its complication.

II. SECTION 338

A. Description of section 338

Title II of the Bill would, essentially, repeal section 334(b)(2) of the Code and substitute for it new section 338. Under the new section, a corporation acquiring 80 percent or more of the stock of another corporation (the "Target Corporation") within a certain time period could elect to treat the Target Corporation as if it had sold all its assets in a section 337 transaction at a price based on the purchase price for the stock.

Significantly, the section 338 election as to a Target Corporation would also apply to all its direct and indirect subsidiaries ("Target Affiliates"), including foreign subsidiaries. Sections 338 (e) and (g)(3)(B). Moreover, the section 338 election would be deemed made as to a Target Corporation (and therefore as to all Target Affiliates) if any asset of the Target Corporation or a Target Affiliate were acquired by the purchasing corporation during a period (called the "Consistency Period") beginning one year before the acquisition period and ending one year after it. Section 338(d)(1).[1]

As a result of that rule, a corporation acquiring assets in a section 337 transaction would be deemed to have elected under section 338 with respect to any acquired subsidiaries (because such subsidiaries would be Target Corporations and assets would have been acquired, within the Consistency Period, from an affiliate (the parent which sold in the section 337 transaction)). Likewise, if a corporation were liquidated under sections 331 and 336 of the Code, and its assets, or some of them, including subsidiaries, were sold by the shareholders to an acquiring corporation, section 338(e) would require that if section 338 were elected as to one acquired subsidiary, it would have to be made as to all acquired subsidiaries.

The election under section 338 is to be made within 75 days after the acquisition of the requisite 80% stock interest.

B. Comments

1. General

The Tax Section is in favor of the repeal of section 334(b)(2) and the substitution of an election not requiring an actual corporate liquidation in order to treat the transaction as an asset acquisition. The effect under the Bill would be to shorten considerably, compared to present law under section 34(b)(2), the maximum period between the effective date of the stock acquisition and the deemed asset purchase. The Tax Section believes that the resulting elimination of complicated interim earnings and profits calculations and other adjustments to tax basis is a desirable simplification of the tax law.

2. Election Period

We believe that 75 days is far too short a time period in which to determine the desirability of, and make, the section 338 election. Whether the election is desirable will depend in the usual case on a complex interplay of factors, including valuations, discounting of tax benefits, and determination of recaptures. Moreover, there would appear to be no detriment to the parties of the government if the election period were extended. We would suggest that the acquiring corporation be permitted to make its section 338 election as late as the actual filing date of the first tax return (its own or the seller's) for a period after the acquisition, since that is the first time it will make a difference whether the election is made. Alternatively, the election period could end 9 months (plus 15 days) after the acquisition, since, in many cases, neither return would be filed before then (taking into account extensions of time).

3. Basis

The Bill provides that the basis of assets under a section 338 election is the purchasing (electing) corporation's basis for the acquired stock, properly adjusted for liabilities and other relevant items. Where 100% of the Target Corporation's stock is acquired, the basis calculation should be relatively straightforward, and that is a distinct improvement over present law. It is not entirely clear, however, what the basis is in the case of a less-than-100 percent purchase of stock. Presumably, the Target Corporation's existing asset basis continues to the extent of the percentage of stock not acquired. For instance, if only 80 percent of the Target Corporation is purchased, for $8 million, liabilities of the Target Corporation are $4 million, and the assets have an old tax basis of $6 million, then the assets should have a new basis of $12.4 million (8 million, plus 80 percent of $4 million, plus 20 percent of $6 million.)[2] Perhaps the basis rules in such a case could be spelled out in the statute or the legislative history.

Also, a case could be made to treat certain preferred stock, not acquired by the acquiring corporation, like a liability for purposes of basis calculations. For instance, if 100 percent of the common stock of a Target Corporation were acquired for $8 million,

[1] An exception is provided, so that there would be no deemed election, in the case where the acquiring corporation's basis in the asset was determined by reference to the transferor's basis or the transfer was an ordinary-course-of-business sale. Section 338(d)(2).

[2] Another way to look at it is to observe that, in a 100 percent purchase (for $10 million), basis would be $14 million, or an $8 million step-up; 80 percent of $8 million is $6.4 million, which, when added to the existing $6 million of basis, equals $12.4 million.

there were no liabilities, the assets had an old basis of $2 million and there were $2 million in liquidating value of preferred stock, which was not acquired, then treating the preferred stock as stock would produce a new asset basis of $8.4 million, but treating the preferred stock as a liability would result in a new asset basis of $10 million.

4. Subsidiaries

We have great difficulty with the complex rules in proposed section 338 which mandate that the election apply to all subsidiaries (including, as mentioned above (pages 3-4), in section 337 and certain section 331 situations).

We understand that those complicated provisions are included in order to avoid giving a purchaser a "selective" step-up in basis. We do not believe that the buyer's choice as to which corporations should be subject to a step-up in basis, with attendant recaptures, is an abuse. The corporate tax law has for many years permitted a purchaser that choice, and a change at this point would dramatically affect the value of existing corporations that own subsidiaries. The practical effect of the solution in the Bill requiring complete step-up and recapture for all subsidiaries is to go well beyond the elimination of tax provisions which unduly favor corporate takeovers, and may be to stop altogether many acquisitions which otherwise would occur and the consummation of which would be healthy for U.S. commerce.

In the first place, the provisions as to subsidiaries seem to be premised on an exaggerated view of a corporation's ability under present law to tailor its assets in connection with a takeover transaction. The proposed treatment of subsidiaries is not necessary to deal with the situation where a target corporation, in anticipation of its sale, rearranges its affairs, for instance, by placing in a subsidiary assets which would not be desired, because of heavy recaptures, to be stepped up. Such a rearrangement could well be subject to a section 269 or other[3] attack. Even if not, however, it could be considered part of an overall plan so that section 338 would apply to the assets of the Target Corporation and those so placed in a subsidiary. That would make it unnecessary to have an automatic rule requiring that all subsidiaries be the subject of the election.

Second, if the Target Corporation has historically conducted business in subsidiaries, there seems to be no good reason to treat the purchase of stock of subsidiaries as an asset purchase merely because the parent corporation's assets are purchased, or treated as purchased. Such treatment in effect ignores the separateness of the various corporate entities which would theretofore have been respected. On the other hand, the separateness continues to be respected for other purposes. For instance, the liquidation of a parent corporation does not fail to be a complete liquidation merely because its subsidiaries are not also liquidated.

Third, the proposed treatment of subsidiaries is particularly onerous in the case of foreign subsidiaries that are controlled foreign corporations. A step-up in asset basis with respect to such subsidiaries is not likely to result in any decrease in U.S. taxation; but under section 338 the assets of each foreign subsidiary will be deemed to have been disposed of, and apparently each subsidiary will be deemed liquidated, in every section 338 situation. In that event the United States shareholder would be taxable on income equal to the "all earnings and profits amount" of the foreign subsidiaries or, at the election of the shareholder, all the gain on the liquidation would be taxable, and section 1248 would apply to the extent of post-1962 earnings and profits. See, Temp. Reg. § 7.367(b)-5.[4] Moreover, the deemed asset sales by the subsidiaries will produce recapture of depreciation with respect to personal property which will increase their earnings and profits which in turn are taxed under either section 367 or section 1248.

Because of the increase in earnings and profits, a "dilution" of any foreign tax credit associated with the subsidiary's earnings and profits will also result.[5] There is no reason to accelerate the taxation of the earnings and profits of foreign subsidiaries in a takeover situation; foreign profits will still be subject to U.S. taxation when actually realized, by sale or distribution, in later years. Such manditory acceleration of tax may well frustrate, or at least greatly complicate, normal acquisitions which are beneficial to the U.S. economy.

The extension of section 338 to subsidiaries will also cause taxation of accumulated DISC income of lower-tier DISC subsidiaries. As in the case of foreign subsidiaries, the sale of the stock or assets of the remote parent of the DISC seems to be an inappropriate reason to end the DISC deferral; the result will be to eliminate the favorable export incentive of the DISC structure.

Another consequence of the extension to subsidiaries could arise in the case of life insurance subsidiaries, which would be deemed to have sold their assets and could, as a result, incur substantial—and we believe unintended—tax liability, well beyond mere recaptures, as a result of the transaction.

Finally, the extension of section 338 to subsidiaries makes the section far more complicated and burdensome than it would be without such extension.

We strongly recommend that the provisions of the Bill which require that the section 338 election be applicable to subsidiaries be deleted. A separate section 338 election should be available for each subsidiary that was acquired by "purchase," provided that each higher-tier subsidiary in the chain of which the subsidiary was a part so elected. At most, section 338 could include a provision to the effect that the election would extend to assets transferred from the Target Corporation to its affiliates within two years of the acquisition, unless the taxpayer established that the transfer was not effected for the principal purpose of avoiding a section 338 election as to them. If, following enactment of the Bill in that form, it became apparent that a strengthening of section 338 were required, that could occur; but it is not desirable at present to take so radical a step as the Bill now contemplates.

III. REDEMPTIONS USING APPRECIATED PROPERTY

A. Description of bill

Section 102 of the Bill would repeal sections 311(d)(2) (A), (B), (C) and (G) of the Code. Those sections provide four exceptions to the general rule of section 311(d), that a corporation recognizes gain on the distribution of property in redemption of stock. The exceptions are: (1) a distribution of assets to a 10% or more shareholder, in complete redemption of his stock held at least one year (section 311(d)(2)(A)); (2) a distribution of stock or debt of a 50% or more owned subsidiary (section 311(d)(2)(B)); (3) distributions in certain Sherman or Clayton Act proceedings (section 311(d)(2)(C)); and (4) certain distributions under the Bank Holding Company Act (section 311(d)(2)(G)).

B. Comments

1. General

The Tax Section believes that a reduction in the scope of section 311(d)(2)(B) is called for. We do not believe, however, that it is necessary or desirable to repeal that section, and we see no reason for significant change in or repeal of sections 311(d)(2) (A) and (C) at the present time.

The issue of broadscale repeal of the section 311(d)(2) exceptions, as opposed to amendments merely to deal with perceived abuses, raises the fundamental question whether a corporation should recognize gain (or loss) on the distribution of its property to its shareholders.

Present law follows the rule of General Utilities & Operating Co., v. Helvering, 296 U.S. 200 (1935), which is codified in sections 311 and 336 of the Code. Under that rule, a corporation generally does not recognize gain or loss on property distributions to shareholders, whether as dividends, in redemption of shares, or in liquidation.

In 1969, Congress amended section 311 to provide for recognition of gain (but not loss) in certain corporate redemptions. At that time, the exceptions to gain recognition now at issue were enacted.[6] The impetus for the 1969 legislation was a perceived abuse—certain corporations, principally insurance companies, were using appreciated portfolio securities to retire stock.[7] The 1969 amendment did not constitute, nor would it appear that there was any intent that it should, a broad attack on the General Utilities concept, put was rather merely a narrowing of its scope.

It is apparent that one impetus for the Bill's proposal concerning section 311 is a particular perceived abuse. (See the discussion of section 311(d)(2)(B), below.) It may also be appropriate, at some point, to re-examine the fundamental concept involved, the General Utilities rule. We suggest, however, that the present Bill be confined to urgent changes to deal with abuses, and that the re-examination be done apart from [3] See, Telephone Answering Service Co. v. Commissioner, 63 TC 414 (1974), aff'd., 546 F.2d 423 (4th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914 (1977) (no complete liquidation where some assets remain in corporate solution after the transaction).

[4] Another possibility would be to view the transaction as a sale of stock of the first tier foreign subsidiary subject to section 1248. Under section 1248, gain recognized on the sale of stock of a controlled foreign corporation by a United States shareholder is generally taxed as a dividend to the extent of the controlled foreign corporation's post-1962 earnings and profits. Section 1248 tax applies already in the case of first-tier foreign subsidiaries of a target corporation whose assets are sold or which is liquidated, even if gain is generally not recognized under sections 337 or 336. Section 1248(f) of the Code. Under the Bill, the election (or deemed election) under section 338 with respect to a domestic subsidiary could in effect result in section 1248(f) treatment of lower-tier foreign subsidiaries.

[5] On the other hand, no step-up is likely to be allowable for foreign tax purposes, with the results that future foreign taxes will be higher than using U.S. concepts of taxable income, and that excess foreign tax credits may result in later years. In the end, there could be substantial unwarranted double taxation, United States and foreign, on the foreign earnings.

[7] See, S. Rept. No. 91-552, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., at 279.

the Bill, without the pressures attendant to a hastily conceived bill to raise critical revenues.

In that re-examination, Congress should focus on the extent to which a double-tax system is appropriate where corporate property is distributed to shareholders. The present rule—General Utilities—results in a partial integration system. The Bill's broadscale repeal of the section 311(d)(2) exceptions would move significantly away from that integration. That is a fundamental change which may or may not be desirable, but we see no good reason to put it into effect now, without thorough study and debate.

2. Section 311(d)(2)(B)

The Tax Section believes that section 311(d)(2)(B) should not be repealed now, but should be narrowed so as to eliminate its availability in corporate acquisitions.

In a number of recent, well-publicized transactions, corporations have been able to dispose of subsidiaries to buyers which acquired the stock of the corporation with a view to a redemption exchange. Whether the disposition is a redemption exchange, and thus tax-free under section 311(d)(2)(B), has produced much debate.[8] Essentially, the issue, which is common to most transactions involving three parties (here, the corporation, the buyer, and the selling stockholders of the corporation), is whether (1) the subsidiary was transferred to the buyer for stock which it acquired from the selling stockholders, or (2) the subsidiary was sold to the buyer for cash which the corporation used to buy in its stock from the selling stockholders. Either construction is consistent with the end result, but under one construction the transaction is taxable to the corporation and under the other it is not.

We believe that the benefits of section 311(d)(2)(B) should be available only to historic shareholders of a corporation, not to persons which buy shares with a view to exchanging them for corporate assets. Accordingly, we believe that section 311(d)(2)(B) should be amended to provide that it does not apply to a redemption of stock held for less than two years.[9] We suggest two years because we believe that there is no doubt that a potential purchaser would not hold corporate stock (usually a minority position) for two years to obtain corporate assets, and that the corporation would likewise not want its shares to be held by that purchaser for so long a period.[10] As a result, a two-year holding period under section 311(d)(2)(B) would effectively preclude its use in a corporate takeover. More sweeping change than that is not warranted at present.

The suggested amendment of section 311(d)(2)(B) should also be accompanied by a provision to permit the distribution of a corporate subsidiary, otherwise qualifying under that section, to a diverse group of shareholders, where there is obviously no takeover context. An example is a distribution to all or most stockholders of a publicly-held corporation (even a pro-rata redemption); in that example it would be difficult to establish the various holding periods of public shareholders so as to demonstrate compliance with the amended provision.

3. Section 311(d)(2)(A)

We are not aware that section 311(d)(2)(A) has been effectively used as a takeover device.[11] On that basis, we would suggest that there is no need to repeal or alter the section. However, if our suggestion of a two-year holding period under section 311(d)(2)(B) is adopted, it would seem logical to have the same holding period established for section 311(d)(2)(A).

4. Section 311(d)(2) (C) and (G)

The distributions involved in section 311(d)(2)(C) are not used in corporate takeovers. Moreover, they are essentially involuntary transactions arising under the antitrust laws. We see no reason to eliminate that exception in the context of a bill to make the tax law neutral as to corporate takeovers.

As to section 311(d)(2)(G), involving distributions under the Bank Holding Company Act and section 1101 of the Code, such distributions would not occur after December 31, 1980 and the elimination of section 311(d)(2)(G) therefore appears appropriate.

5. Partial Liquidations; Spin-offs

We discuss partial liquidations more generally in IV, below. We note here, however, that the tightening of section 311(d)(2) would also call for tightening of partial liquidations and section 355 transactions.

Assuming for the moment that the partial liquidation provisions are not repealed (as is our recommendation), it would be necessary to prevent a buyer from acquiring corporate stock to be surrendered in a partial liquidation (tax-free to the corporation under section 336) for a desired corporate asset. Indeed, the Standard Linen case itself involved that kind of partial liquidation. We suggest that the same two-year holding period as is suggested under section 311(d)(2)(B) requirement be added in the partial liquidation context to confine the use of a partial liquidation to historic shareholders.

As to section 355, we believe that attention should be given to the question whether corporate assets can be acquired, in a takeover context, on a tax-free basis using the tax-free spin-off provisions. For instance, it is at least arguable that section 355 could be applicable to the distribution of a 100 percent owned subsidiary to a stockholder in redemption of its stock, even though such stock was recently acquired for cash in order to be used in the redemption. If section 355 does apply, then there would be no tax to the distributing corporation, even if the recommended amendments were made (or if the Bill's provisions were enacted in toto) with respect to sections 311 and 346. Accordingly, Congress should prevent section 355 from being used as a corporate takeover vehicle just as sections 311(d) and 346 could be used. The failure of the Bill to cover that point is an excellent example of why legislation in the complex area of Subchapter C should be undertaken only with deliberate care, and not as part of an intense, accelerated revenue-raising package.

IV. PARTIAL LIQUIDATIONS

A. Description of bill

The Bill would repeal the partial liquidation provisions of section 346 of the Code, and amend section 302 of the Code so as to permit sale or exchange (capital gain) treatment to a shareholder in certain transactions now qualifying as partial liquidations.

B. Comments

1. General

The partial liquidation provisions of the Code have been used in certain recent takeovers. We believe that there is one significant loophole in the present scheme (the elimination of investment credit recapture under the Consolidated Return Regulations) which should be closed, and that a case could be made that there is another possible loophole (deferral of depreciation and other recaptures under such Regulations) which might well be closed. Beyond that, we do not believe that it is clear that any change in law is warranted.

2. Investment Credit Recapture

Under present regulations, the distribution of assets in a partial liquidation to a corporate shareholder does not result in investment credit recaptures if the parties file a consolidated tax return. We believe that, in a takeover context, i.e., where the credits were earned before affiliation, that is clearly wrong and that the Consolidated Return Regulations should be amended prospectively or that a legislative override of the Regulations should be enacted.

3. Depreciation Recapture

Under present regulations, the distribution of assets in a partial liquidation in a consolidated return situation is a deferred intercompany transaction, so that income recaptures are recognized, but deferred and restored (i.e., added to income) as the basis step-up is used by the distributee. Where the item being recaptured (e.g., depreciation) was earned prior to consolidation, it is arguable that deferral is inappropriate. (Deferral is certainly appropriate to the extent the item was earned during, rather than before, consolidation.) On balance, we would recommend that the Consolidated Return Regulations be amended, prospectively, to eliminate deferral for recapture of pre-affiliation items, or that a similar legislative override be provided.

4. Other Changes

It is arguable that, in a consolidated (or even in any intercompany) situation, basis step-up to a distributee corporation should not occur selectively (i.e., in a partial liquidation) at all. The argument would be that section 334(b)(2), which presumes a complete liquidation, should be the exclusive route to a step-up in basis, and that in a mere partial liquidation, the corporate parties, both distributing corporation and distributee corporation, should be treated the same as if the assets were not distributed in liquidation, but instead under section 301 of the Code. (That would result in basis carryover, not step-up.)

Such a rule could be adopted by regulation if it were confined to corporations filing consolidated returns, but the logic of the rule would seem applicable to all intercompany situations, whether consolidated returns are filed or not. That suggests a legislative solution.

We take no position whether the foregoing rule should be adopted. The consolidat-

[8] Compare Standard Linen Service, Inc., 33 T.C. 1 (1959) (acq.), with Idol v. Commissioner, 319 F.2d 647 (8th Cir. 1963), aff'g 38 T.C. 444 (1962). See also L.R. 8042140.

[9] Indeed, even one year might well be enough. As mentioned below (page 17), the one year holding period of section 311(d)(2)(A) seems to have prevented its use in takeover contexts.

[10] A provision should be included to the effect that stock held by a person that had a contractual right to exchange the stock for a subsidiary of the issuer would not be considered as being held for purposes of the holding period requirement.

[11] That is because of the one-year holding period requirement in the section. See Rev. Rul. 80-221, 1980-2 C. B. 107, for an attempt to use section 311(d)(2)(A) in a takeover context. The attempt was not successful.

ed return recapture rule changes recommended in paragraphs (2) and (3), above, may be adequate to deal with corporate takeover problems in the partial liquidation context. We do feel strongly, however, that there is no good reason to repeal the partial liquidation provisions as applicable to distributions not in an intercompany context.[12] We recommend that section 346 be retained in its present form for distributions other than to 80% corporate shareholders. Thus, section 336 would still prevent recognition of gain to the distributing corporation in such a partial liquidation. The section 302 amendment would be unnecessary in that event.

We note that under proposed new section 302(a) (section 101(c) of the Bill), it might be necessary to have an actual stock redemption in order for the section to apply. That is the rule under section 302, although the rule under section 346 is different.[13] If proposed section 302(e) is enacted, it should be made clear that the rule of Fowler Hosiery will apply.

V. EFFECTIVE DATES

A. Description of bill

The provisions of the Bill relating to sections 338 and 334(b)(2) apply to acquisitions occurring after August 31, 1982. The amendments to sections 331 and 346 apply to distributions after that date.

B. Comment

The Tax Section believes that the foregoing August 31 effective date should be changed to the later of the date of enactment or December 31, 1982. As a general matter, we think that the effective dates in the Bill should not be so soon as to disrupt pending transactions which were planned and as to which there has been reliance, including the incurrence of transaction costs, on existing law, at least where the result under current law was acknowledged by the government. For instance, the consolidated return treatment of recaptures in a partial liquidation is clear under the regulations and the Internal Revenue Service (the "Service") has issued frequent favorable rulings on the subject.[14] Transactions may be pending which will not close by August 31, but which were planned based on those authorities and pursuant to which taxpayers have incurred substantial costs. It would be unfair for the effective date of Title I of the Bill to be so soon as to apply to such transactions.

As to the section 311 amendments (i.e., the essential amendment to (or repeal of) section 311(d)(2)(B)), the corporate takeover technique involved is obviously not clearly permitted by the Service and may well be challenged by it. On the other hand, the correct result is by no means clear and may vary from case to case depending on the facts. Under the circumstances, we believe, the effective date should permit existing law (as to which no inference should be drawn from any amendment to section 311) to apply to transactions which are closed before 1983.

As to section 338, a prompt effective date would not be objectionable if the section only applied (as we strongly recommend) to the Target Corporation and those subsidiaries elected by the purchaser. Extension of section 338 to all subsidiaries, however, would in fairness call for a more delayed effective date. Parties could be substantially committed to many transactions (although there might not technically be binding contracts) in contemplation of existing section 334(b)(2), and if section 338 is to apply to subsidiaries, such transactions should be permitted to close based on existing law. We therefore recommend that the effective date of section 338 be December 31, 1982, rather than August 31, 1982, provided, however, that a transaction which is substantially binding on the parties (apart from customary closing conditions, such as financial condition, updating of warranties, third party consents and approvals, etc.) on July 1, 1982 be permitted to close after 1982 under existing law.

[12] Among other situations in which it is appropriate to retain section 346 is that of a family or other dispute among shareholders, and resulting division of a business (not qualifying under section 355).

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I intend to vote against this bill—the so-called Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.

It is with some regret that I oppose this bill, as it does contain a number of worthwhile provisions. Indeed, I am as much in favor of "tax equity" and "fiscal responsibility" as any Member of the Senate. But any action that we take to accomplish these goals must reflect a clear understanding of our budget priorities and current economic conditions. Unfortunately, the bill before the Senate does not do so.

I have several objections to this bill. First, I do not agree with the approximately $13 billion in reductions that the bill makes in the medicare program over the next 3 years. As reported, the bill would distribute the cuts in the following manner: Hospitals would absorb 49.3 percent of the reductions, physicians 18.9 percent, employers and health insurance plans 15.5 percent, and beneficiaries 16.3 percent.

One result will surely be the shifting of additional costs from the providers of health care to those individuals covered by private health insurance. The most serious result, however, is that rising health care costs will be passed along to medicare beneficiaires, to the elderly who frequently are the least able to afford increased out-of-pocket costs.

While the overall costs of the medicare program have been increasing rapidly, the result has not been due to a larger number of beneficiaries. Rather, it is due to steadily rising hospital costs and physician fees. By adopting these proposals, we are simply passing along those same costs to the most vulnerable members of our society.

Proponents of the cuts argue that beneficiaries should consider the costs of health care and be given an incentive to keep those costs down. Yet, the elderly already pay 30 percent of their overall health care costs and, under the medicare program, must pay 40 percent of their physicians' bills.

My colleague from Montana, Senator BAUCUS, offered an amendment which would have deleted the three medicare cuts that will most severely affect the elderly. I supported his proposal, but unfortunately it was defeated by a vote of 46 to 53.

A compromise amendment was then unanimously adopted that would mitigate that effect to some degree. Specifically, the amendment would impose a 5-percent copayment on home health visits beginning with the 20th visit. Further, it would provide for an increase in the deductible for medical expenses under part B of medicare in 1984 and 1985, eliminating the increase in 1983. And finally, it would sunset after 1985 the provision which will hold constant the premium under part B as a percentage of program costs.

The bill also makes over the next 3 years $2.2 billion in cuts in the medicaid program, $1.4 billion in reductions in the aid to families with dependent children program, and $450 million in cuts in the supplemental security income program.

On the whole, I find these program reductions regrettable. They strike at the poor and the elderly who have already been asked through legislation passed last year to bear more of the costs for health care and basic needs. And they shift costs to the States and to the providers of care. These cuts could have been avoided altogether had the committee chosen other means of raising revenue, such as by repealing the oil industry tax breaks enacted last year.

Second, I believe that any bill that is intended to improve equity in the tax system must address the inequity of last year's tax cut. Once inflation and higher social security taxes are considered, that tax bill gives taxpayers earning more than $50,000 a year almost two-thirds of the tax cut, even though this group contributes only one-third of total income taxes. This distribution of tax benefits is clearly unfair.

Efforts were made by myself and others to restore some sense of equity to the personal income tax cut. I offered an amendment that would have given middle-income taxpayers a greater share of the tax cut.

While these efforts were not successful, the one successful amendment affecting individuals will result in even greater inequity in the Tax Code. I am referring to the amendment that provides for the indexing of capital gains taxation to inflation. The existing special treatment of capital gains is extremely beneficial to the wealthy. Over 60 percent of the capital gains benefit accrues to the richest 6 percent of all taxpayers. Extending this special tax treatment even further by indexing capital gains only compounds the unfairness in the Tax Code.

I admit that there are important tax reform measures included in the bill, but they pale in comparison to the failure to deal with the inequity of last year's tax cut and of the capital gains amendment.

A third reason for opposing the bill deals with specific tax provisions. I believe certain provisions do not contribute to tax reform but instead threaten to be highly unfair or counterproductive. For example, the restrictions of the medical expense and casualty loss deductions will squeeze middle-class taxpayers and expose them to greater financial losses from unexpected events.

Also, the increased unemployment tax will be especially burdensome on small businesses. I do not believe that, as we are seeking an economic recovery, we should add to the costs of hiring new workers. Furthermore, I oppose the higher excise taxes, primarily the increase in the cigarette and telephone excise taxes. These only add another regressive element to our tax system. Finally, the interest and dividend withholding proposal will result in inconvenience for taxpayers, particularly the elderly, and in administrative burdens on financial institutions. Other proposals that would be less burdensome could have been substituted for the withholding measure.

TREATMENT OF INTANGIBLE DRILLING COSTS UNDER H.R. 4961

● Mr. NICKLES. I would like to engage in a brief colloquy with the chairman of the Finance Committee (Mr. DOLE) to clarify language contained in the report of the committee.

On page 120 of the report, describing the treatment of Intangible Drilling Costs (IDC's), the report states in the last paragraph: "The new 15-percent cutback rule will apply only to otherwise expensed IDS's."

Under the bill, integrated oil companies, that is, companies not eligible for percentage depletion, are required to capitalize and amortize 15 percent of their IDC's as if they were 5-year ACRS property eligible for investment tax credit but without availability of safe harbor leasing treatment. As to the remaining IDC there is an annual election to capitalize all or any portion of such IDC under the same new rules as required for the 15 percent.

My concern is that this statement in the committee report could be misconstrued to mean that even after losing deductibility of 15 percent of their total IDC's a taxpayer would be denied deductibility of an additional 15 percent of the remaining 85 percent of their total IDC's. For example, if I have $100 of total IDC's I am required to capitalize and amortize $15 as if it were 5-year ACRS property. As to the remaining $85, I can elect either to currently expense as under present law, or capitalize and amortize as 5-year ACRS property any portion of the remaining $85, but I would not be denied deductibility of an additional 15 percent of the $85 if I elect to deduct those IDC's.

Is this the understanding of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. The denial of deductibility of 15 percent of intangible drilling costs applies only to 15 percent of the total amount of IDC's which an integrated oil company has in any taxable year. It is not intended that the 15-percent cutback would be applied twice, that is, to both the 100 percent of total IDC's and again to the remaining 85 percent. This would be a double penalty which was never intended by the committee.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. It is the understanding of the Senator from Texas that under the accounting method changes for long-term contracts, a contract which is not expected to be an "extended period long-term contract" would not become an "extended period long-term contract" because of unforeseeable circumstances which are abnormal and which a reasonable businessman could not anticipate based on his prior experience with similar long-term contracts under similar conditions. For example, some weather delays can be anticipated and will result in an "extended period long-term contract." On the other hand, abnormal and unusual weather delays which are unforeseeable and could not be reasonably anticipated under the circumstances will not result in the contract becoming an "extended period long-term contract." Would the Senator from Kansas agree that this understanding is correct?

Mr. DOLE. The understanding of the Senator from Texas is correct.●

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, in the committee report at page 201 there is a footnote which states:

In order to prevent avoidance of the new cost allocation rules, it is anticipated that Treasury may be required to amend both the regulations relating to the completed contract method and the regulations relating to the full absorption inventory costing method.

Could the Senator please explain more fully what the Finance Committee had in mind as to what changes, if any, would be made with respect to taxpayers who, although their contracts are considered long-term contracts under the bill, have consistently reported income on an accrual basis as each unit under a multiunit contract is shipped?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the committee intends that taxpayers would be able to use the accrual-shipment method for multiunit long-term contracts. However, the committee recognized that some taxpayers which report income under the accrual method of accounting may obtain the same benefit of deferring income until completion of a contract as so taxpayers using the completed contract method of accounting. For example, if a taxpayer had a contract to produce one large item, income from the contract would not be reported until shipment whether the taxpayer was using the completed-contract or accrual-shipment method of accounting.

The committee bill directs the Treasury Department to revise its cost-allocation regulations for long-term contracts to properly allocate all costs to long-term contracts of taxpayers using the completed-contract method. the committee was concerned that taxpayers accounting for long-term contracts under the accrual method not receive better treatment than taxpayers using the completed-contract method. Therefore, the committee intended that the IRS change its cost-allocation regulations for inventories in the case of where the use of the accrual method for long-term contracts results in the same deferral benefits at the completed-contract method. However, it was not the intention of the committee to change the cost-allocation rules for inventories in the case of contracts which are not eligible for the long-term contract accounting rules of present law.●

MEDICARE TAX ON FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am opposed to the proposed 1.3-percent medicare tax on Federal and postal employees called for by this bill. This newly proposed tax places an unwarranted burden on millions of postal and Federal employees without any corresponding increase in benefits. The new tax combined with other reductions in Federal benefits called for under the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1983 would result in an inequitable and disproportionate burden being placed on Federal workers.

This proposal, which has been recommended by the administration and adopted by the Finance Committee, would require Federal and postal employees to pay an additional 1.3 percent hospital insurance tax on the first $32,400 in annual salary. At age 65, such employees would then qualify for medicare coverage. This new tax imposes a serious burden on Federal employees and results in a reduction in pay without any real increase in benefits. An employee making $27,000 a year would have to pay an additional $351 annually, or $13.50 each paycheck. This new tax would place an unfair burden on these employees since the new tax would be in addition to the 7 percent they already pay into the retirement program and the payment they already make into a Federal Employee Health Benefits plan. The new medicare coverage which would be provided would not result in any new benefit coverage since the Federal Employees Health Benefits program already provides nearly identical benefits. In essence, many postal and Federal workers would pay for medicare protection which they would never receive. The medicare tax also would increase sharply over the next 4 years. The tax rate will increase from 1.3 percent in 1983-84 to 1.35 percent in 1985 to 1.45 percent in 1986. The maximum tax base would increase from $35,400 in 1983 to $45,600 in 1986. As a result, the take home pay of Federal employees would be correspondingly reduced further exasperating the inequity of this measure.

The employees who would be brought under the new tax have already made many sacrifices at the hands of congressional budget cutters. They have had their retirement benefits systematically reduced on a piece-by-piece basis, they have had their pay frozen and capped at unrealistically low levels, they have had job security reduced by furloughs and RIF's, and they face even more drastic cutbacks in their pay, benefits, and job security during this budget-cutting season.

Although many argue that Federal and postal employees receive a windfall medicare benefit, that is simply not true. The fact that some Federal employees already became eligible for medicare is due to the fact they earned such benefits. No Federal worker can receive medicare coverage through any other means except by qualifying under law and paying into the system like every other citizen that qualifies under medicare.

The levying of the medicare tax, although it would have an immediate impact on the solvency of the hospital insurance trust fund, is also shortsighted, in my opinion, because it will impose greater burdens on the fund in the future as the millions of new beneficiaries reach medicare eligibility. Further, Congress will have to appropriate $600 million for the Government's employer medicare tax matching contributions. The CBO estimates that the health insurance tax will have to be matched by the Government at a $600 level. This means that the proposed medicare tax will not raise any new revenue.

Based on these arguments, I am opposed to this provision which imposes new taxation on Federal and postal employees.●

DEFERRAL OF TAX ON DIVIDENDS REINVESTED IN QUALIFIED ORIGINAL ISSUE PLANS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I want to express my concern that H.R. 4961 provides, in section 243, for the termination of the dividend reinvestment legislation which was enacted into law as recently as August of last year in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981—section 3211. My distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Mr. BRADY, joins me in this statement.

That legislation provides for the deferral of taxes on dividends reinvested under original issue plans of qualified utilities—with an annual limitation of $750 for an individual taxpayer and $1,500 for a joint return. It was adopted—as part of a compromise reached in the conference on the 1981 act—for a 4-year trial period ending in 1985. Its purpose was to encourage increased savings, investment, and new common stock capital formation to help in the financing of basic utility facilities which are essential to the well-being of our national economy. I feel strongly that it ought to be retained for at least the 4-year trail period.

First, we now have concrete evidence that this legislation is doing exactly what it was intended to do and that it represents one of the outstanding successes of the 1981 act. Some 2 million stockholders—and they are primarily the smaller stockholders—are now reinvesting dividends under qualified plans. Such reinvestment increased 26.2 percent in the first quarter of 1982—as compared with the fourth quarter of 1981—an increase almost five times greater than the average quarterly increase in 1981. In the first quarter of 1982, some $345 million of new common stock capital was provided through such reinvested dividends, along with an additional $100 million under the cash option provisions of qualified plans.

The need of these capital-intensive utilities for new capital has in no way diminished. And, it is clear that the new common stock capital provided under the qualified plans has been and is being used to finance essential capital facilities.

Second, the estimated revenue gain resulting from the proposed repeal represents less than 1 percent of the total revenue gain objective and, as I understand it, this estimate excludes completely any consideration of "feedback". On the other hand, we have the judgment of reputable economists that the increased common stock capital provided in response to the tax deferral provision will increase business fixed investment, national output and employment and will provide a significant stimulus to the national economy which, over a 3-year period, would produce additional taxable revenues offsetting or exceeding the initial revenue losses.

Third, it is very clear that a substantial number of stockholders participating in these qualified plans have acted in reliance on the tax deferral incentive provided by Congress for a 4-year period. It seems to me to be highly unfair and bad congressional policy now to pull the rug out from under these stockholders and to repeal this legislation after only 1 year.

I fully appreciate the pressures to enact a revenue-raising bill which will meet the budgetary targets—and the problems which would be created by efforts to modify, section by section, the bill reported by the Finance Committee. Accordingly, I am not now proposing any revision in the section dealing with repeal of the dividend reinvestment legislation. I take comfort in the fact that when this provision was initially considered by the Finance Committee on the merits, a majority, including Senators from both sides of the aisle, voted for its retention. I hope that the other body will not join in the repeal of the highly constructive dividend reinvestment legislation; and, if it does not, I hope that our representatives at the subsequent conference will recede on this issue.

● Mr. DURENBERGER. I would call to the attention of the Senator from Kansas section 233 of this bill for the purpose of clarifying a provision in that section. In general, this section reduces capital recovery deductions available to projects financed with industrial development bonds by denying the ACRS schedule for accelerated depreciation to those projects and substituting another depreciation schedule. Some exceptions are made. There are some types of facilities that will continue to qualify for ACRS even though they are financed by tax-exempt bonds.

One such type of facility is residential rental property as defined by section 103(b)(4)(A) of the code. Section 103(b)(4)(A) was amended in 1980 to limit qualified housing in several ways. At that time there were some projects grandfathered in even though they did not meet the new definition. These projects had already been approved by local governments and were in the pipeline. My purpose in calling to the attention of the Senator this section is to ascertain whether the projects that were grandfathered in under the 1980 amendments will also be considered residential rental property for the purposes of the exception in section 233 of this bill.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. All residential rental property which qualifies for tax exemption under section 103(b)(4)(A) including those projects which were grandfathered under the 1980 amendments will be eligible for both tax-exempt bond financing and ACRS capital recovery.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, subtitle D of title II of the bill before us deals with the taxation of life insurance companies. Several features of this section are similar to the provisions of legislation providing special temporary rules for taxing the income of life insurance companies (S. 2353) which Senators CHAFEE, BOREN, DURENBERGER and 37 of our other colleagues joined me in sponsoring earlier this year.

The provisions in subtitle D of H.R. 4961 are not exactly like those proposed in S. 2353. While the reported language of some of the more complex life insurance tax provisions pose some technical problems, they have been brought to the Finance Committee's attention and they have been worked out in the spirit of true cooperation to make the provisions operate as intended.

One of the major objectives underlying the Bentsen-Chafee bill was to mitigate temporarily the adverse effects of certain defects in the existing rules for taxing the life insurance companies and to lay the foundation for the more detailed study required to find permanent solutions to problems involved in taxing the life insurance business. It was the intention of the sponsors of S. 2353 that, once the stopgap bill had been enacted, the Treasury, the Congress and the life insurance industry would begin to work together toward finding these permanent solutions to defects in the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959.

Mr. President, should H.R. 4961 eventually be enacted into law, I urge the administration to take the lead in establishing a working group to address this important tax policy issue and to start on the long-term reform of life insurance taxation. The industry and the Congress are anxious to begin this cooperative venture with the Treasury. The Bentsen-Chafee bill was an important and constructive first step in this direction and I am anxious that the process be continued without delay.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to commend the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) and the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE) for their tireless efforts in working with the Treasury Department, the Finance Committee, and the life insurance industry in fashioning an acceptable solution to the taxation of life insurance companies. They have both made an important contribution to creating a solid foundation on which to develop a more comprehensive reform of the taxation of the life insurance business.

I fully agree with the Senator from Texas that initiatives must now be taken by the administration, the Congress, and the life insurance business to work together to carefully examine the manner in which these companies are taxed and to develop a just and equitable solution to the defects in the 1959 law. The measure we are debating today provides only a 3-year solution and I see this bill as the beginning of the road, not the end. I look forward to working with the Senators from Texas and Rhode Island on this important tax policy issue.

IDB HEARINGS AND APPROVAL

● Mr. DURENBERGER. I would like to bring to the attention of the Senator from Kansas section 222 of this bill which relates to public approval of industrial development bonds. I bring this matter up to make sure that there is no confusion as to the requirements set forth in that section.

The committee report describing the public hearing requirement states the following on page 170:

If the voter referendum alternative is not used, the bill requires that a public hearing be held by the issuer of all tax-exempt IDBs and by each governmental unit in which any facility with respect to which bond proceeds are to be used is located. In the case of multiple governmental units within a State having concurrent jurisdiction over the geographic area of the location of the facility, only the issuer and one of the units having jurisdiction over the area where the facilities are located are required to hold public hearings.

The committee report further describes the requirement for elected official approval in the following terms:

Following the public hearing and prior to issuance of the bonds, the applicable elected representative of each governmental unit holding the required hearing must approve issuance of the bonds.

Now it is my understanding and I hope the Senator from Kansas will confirm this, that this language is included in the committee bill primarily to prevent a particular kind of abuse that was occurring. Some governments and quasi-governmental agencies have been issuing bonds, the proceeds of which were being used to build facilities that were located entirely outside the jurisdiction of the issuing government or authority, without the concurrence of the governments where the facilities are located.

However, I am concerned that this language might be interpreted to require two public hearings and approval procedures in circumstances where one would suffice to assure that the affected public is heard and their rights protected by their elected representative.

I am speaking of the situation where a State agency—say a State housing finance agency—issues a bond the proceeds of which are used to build a qualified housing project. Now, under the provisions of the bill, the housing finance agency would have to hold a hearing and an elected official of the State government would have to approve the issue. But the bill might also be read to require a separate hearing by the local government with jurisdiction over the land on which the project was to be built.

Further, it might appear that a local elected official would also have to approve the bond. In the case I cite, I do not believe that we intended to require two hearings and two approval procedures. Provided that the project is to be built within the State, no second hearing or second approval should be necessary in this instance. I would ask the Senator from Kansas if this is a correct interpretation of the provision.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Minnesota is correct. In these cases he cites only one hearing and one elected official approval would be required, provided the elected official is an elected official of the governmental unit having jurisdiction over the area where the bond-financed facilities are located. The hearing would be conducted by the State agency and the approval would be by the chief elected State executive officer or his designee.●

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I intend to cast my vote against final passage of H.R. 4961, the 1982 medicare cut and tax increase bill.

This is not an easy vote. I have spent many hours pondering what is the proper course for me to take—proper for the people of Arizona and proper for the Nation as a whole. In the final analysis, however, the issue comes to this: Is this legislation the right way to partially offset what will be the largest deficit in American history? The answer is "No."

Unfortunately, the administration which entered office with high hopes and the full backing of the American people has faltered in its economic policies. The 1980 election put us all on record in favor of fiscal responsibility, and most especially a balanced Federal budget. The administration convinced itself that this could be accomplished by simultaneously increasing defense spending, and decreasing taxes.

The result of these actions has been a massive recession which still shows no real signs of abating and Federal deficits far in excess of those contemplated in previous years. Now, the administration has decided that the deficits created by its own policies are intolerable and asks Congress to pass the largest peacetime tax increase in history.

The rational approach to fiscal matters should have been to decrease taxes commensurate with decreases in Federal spending. Many of us in Congress have asked the President to reconsider the orignial tax cut bill and to phase in those cuts as the Federal budget can absorb them. That still remains the proper course of action.

The bill we have before us today will strike a powerful blow against middle-income Americans, although it seeks to masquerade as a bill which closes corporate loopholes.

The tax increase bill will double the excise tax on telephone service, an action that will have special impact on Arizonans in light of recent and very substantial increases in telephone rates.

The tax increase bill initiates the withholding of dividends and interest payments to individuals at great cost in paperwork for financial institutions like savings and loan companies which are already going bankrupt because of the deteriorating economic situation. It will also impact on retired persons who rely upon their interest and dividends to make ends meet. I fought this proposal when it was advanced by the Carter administration and its advocacy by the Reagan administration has not affected its total inappropriateness.

The tax increase bill dramatically increases the total amount of medical expenses a family must incur before they can be taken as a deduction. It also reduces from $150 to $100 the amount of insurance premiums that can be deducted, an action that will impact upon practically every single filer of an itemized return.

The tax increase bill will double—from 8 to 16 cents—the Federal excise tax on cigarettes. Whatever one's views on the harm that may accrue from smoking, this type of tax penalizes only the poor and middle-income persons.

The tax increase bill raises the wage base upon which business—including hard-hit small business—will have to pay FUTA—Federal Unemployment Tax Act. It also increases the FUTA tax rate.

The tax increase bill reverses some of the capital formation—that is, productivity enhancing—changes in depreciation allowances enacted last year which I cosponsored.

The tax increase bill also substantially reduces the basis upon which the investment tax credit is calculated, further reducing the incentives to invest in our undercapitalized economy.

The tax increase bill does close some corporate tax loopholes, but leaves hundreds of others wide open. First, it is totally deceptive to believe that closing these loopholes will not affect average taxpayers. Taxes are a cost of doing business, and businesses will simply pass them on. So, we will all pay in the long run.

Second, the selective closing of loopholes is a mixed blessing. It is a process whereby Congress decides that this loophole is better than that loophole and therefore it penalizes or rewards businesses according to who had the best lobbyists. The rational approach to the terrible problem of our Tax Code—the approach which I have sponsored in S. 2147—is to scrap the present system in favor of a broad-base flat-rate tax. It eliminates all loopholes for individuals and corporations and applies a reasonable tax on all income. This would provide the Government with sufficient revenue and restore basic equity to a system whose fundamental unfairness has gotten out of hand.

The time, Mr. President, when the administration and Congress will have to acknowledge that this Nation's fiscal affairs are in dissaray is close upon us. We are like helpless bystanders trying to stop massive hemorrhaging with band-aids. The American people—certainly the people of Arizona—are tired of the deceptions and false promises. They do not want "pie in the sky" promises; they do not want free lunches; they do not want what is not rightfully theirs.

However, they do demand that their elected representatives place commitment to the country above the empty rhetoric of campaign promises and election strategies. They want commonsense, common decency, and common fairness to be the rule and not the exception.

First, the present tax system must be fundamentally transformed to meet the dual needs of revenue raising and equity. The flat-rate tax is the best way to achieve this. Second, we must pass a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced Federal budget as a means of forcing Government to live within its means in the face of constant political temptation. Third, we must keep our taxes as low as possible without going into national debt by adopting rational, not irrational, fiscal policies.

In the meantime, Mr. President, I find the 1982 tax increase bill unacceptable. I proposed that we reduce the deficit by cutting certain Federal programs, like foreign aid. We cannot continue to take and take from the American people while we open our Treasury to foreigners. Generosity and altruism have their place, but our obligations are to our own citizens first. And, those citizens, Mr. President, are suffering from unemployment, high interest rates, poor productivity, a lack of capital investment, a decimated housing industry and an unprecedented number of bankruptcies.

When there are alternatives to raising taxes at a time of extreme economic hardship, we owe it to those we represent to pursue those alternatives. If we can cut foreign aid, eliminate waste, reduce the number of trips Government officials take and the number of cars the Government buys, we should. Raising taxes should be a method of last resort, not a substitute for making difficult decisions about the size, role and function of the Federal Government.

I cannot in good conscience support a measure which increases taxes on American working men and women by $100 billion at a time when many millions are out of work and are experiencing the desperation of shattered dreams.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose passage of this bill because of its unjust tilt against average taxpayers and the elderly who are sick.

This extraordinary package of unprecedented tax increases and excessive spending cuts is being sought by the administration for one reason only—as a fig leaf over the incredible Federal budget deficits caused by the unfair Reagan tax cuts of 1981 and the administration's massive increases in spending for defense.

The most objectionable features of the bill are those that inflict heavy new sacrifices on the elderly and the poor, slashing billions of dollars in spending for medicare and medicaid. The increase in the part B premium, the increase in the deductible, and the increase in home health costs mean that at the very time when they are sick and can least afford it, millions of senior citizens will be required to pay hundreds of millions of dollars out of their own pockets for health care.

And these increases are only the beginning of the nightmare of higher health care costs awaiting the elderly under this measure. The billions of dollars saved by limits on medicare payments to physicians and hospitals will not be absorbed by the providers of health care. Instead, these costs will be shifted—to the elderly, to the young, to working men and women. The record is clear that as medicare payments are cut, more and more physicians refuse to accept medicare reimbursement as payment in full. Instead, they accept medicare as partial reimbursement, and then bill the elderly for the rest. Such practices are an affront to the concept of medicare and they should not be fostered by any action of this Congress.

In a very real sense, this legislation asks the most vulnerable older Americans to pay for the Reagan administration's failing economic policy. In combination with the administration's repeated attempts to slash social security, the cuts in medicare demonstrate the callous and insensitive nature of the Reagan program.

In addition, while the bill does contain a number of worthwhile tax reforms, I believe that it flunks the test of basic fairness to average taxpayers. At the very least, the Senate should have postponed the third year of the Reagan tax cut for the wealthiest individuals, and deferred the indexing of the tax laws until a balanced budget is achieved.

Although the bill raises $98 billion through tax increases over the next 3 years, it carefully avoids any significant increases in taxes on the oil industry, which will continue to enjoy some of the most lucrative and least justifiable tax loopholes in the entire Internal Revenue Code.

For these reasons, I believe the pending bill falls short of the goal of fair tax and spending policy, and it does not deserve to pass.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, the Finance Committee reconciliation bill contains a provision that troubles me greatly. I am referring to the provision which repeals the trans-Alaska pipeline windfall profit tax adjustment. Although the repeal of the TAPS adjustment will result in some increased revenues in the coming years, I am concerned that it may have some detrimental long-term effects on our ability to achieve a greater degree of energy independence. What we must understand is that this is actually an add-on tax on Alaskan oil production over and above that prescribed by Congress policy decision in 1979. Moreover, Congress included this provision for some sound policy reasons—reasons some find convenient to ignore in our zealous search for new revenues.

Essentially, the purpose of the TAPS adjustment is to provide producers of the Sadlerochit Reservoir in Prudhoe Bay with a guarantee that wellhead prices and the windfall profit tax liability will not increase merely because of a decrease in the cost of transporting oil through TAPS. The TAPS adjustment allows an increase in the adjusted base price of Prudhoe Bay oil shipped through TAPS equal to the difference between the producers cost of moving oil through TAPS and $6.26, which was the average of tariffs during 1979.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I will, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Alaska is essentially saying that the TAPS adjustment was enacted to protect TAPS owners from a potential double penalty resulting from a pending regulatory action by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) that might cause a decrease in tariffs.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. The Senator is correct. If FERC imposed a decrease in TAPS tariffs, not only would the pipeline income accruing to the pipeline owners decrease, but windfall profit tax liabilities would increase. Congress foresaw this possibility in 1979 when it was drafting the windfall profit tax.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield on that point, Mr. President?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Yes, I will, Mr. President.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to elaborate on what Senator MURKOWSKI has just said. Prudhoe Bay production is the only domestic oil whose wellhead price calculations depend on transportation costs as well as international market prices. Accordingly, inclusion of the TAPS adjustment was a recognition by Congress that the windfall profit tax was enacted to capture increased oil company revenues due to decontrol of U.S. crude prices at the wellhead and was not intended to penalize producers for regulatory changes in the cost of transportation. We must also recognize that the repeal of this provision puts FERC in a conflict of interest position because an arbitrary change in the TAPS tariff can be used to substantially increase Government revenue. Absent the TAPS adjustment, all Prudhoe Bay oil could incur inequitably higher windfall profit tax liabilities than the other tier 1 producers whose posted prices at the wellhead are not affected by fluctuating pipeline tariffs.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I will, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. In my own State of Kansas, crude oil is generally sold at the wellhead but such is not the case for Alaskan oil. As Senator STEVENS has said, Alaskan oil seems unique in that it is not sold at the wellhead, but at the points where it can either be refined or introduced into pipelines which can deliver it to refineries. These points, which are located primarily on the U.S. west and gulf coasts, are also the places where market prices are established by competition with imported and other domestic crudes. Thus, while other domestic crude oil is generally sold before transportation costs are incurred, the Prudhoe Bay oil sales price includes tranportation costs.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. The chairman of the Finance Committee is absolutely correct. Senator BAUCUS, the author of the amendment in the Finance Committee which proposed the removal of the TAPS adjustment, justified the amendment on the basis that there was no compelling reason to treat TAPS oil differently than any other oil for purposes of the windfall profit tax. Now I have great respect for my colleague from Montana and the other members of the Finance Committee who voted for the Baucus amendment; however, I fear that they might have lost sight of the basic fact that Senator STEVENS just made: the uniqueness of Prudhoe Bay oil. Again, Prudhoe Bay production is the only domestic oil whose wellhead price calculations vary with transportation costs. When the TAPS tariff falls, the wellhead price will rise, since the oil is sold at market prices. While it costs less than a dollar to move a barrel of oil produced in the lower 48 to the refinery, it costs from $5 to $7 just to move a barrel of North Slope oil from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez. This is indeed a unique situation.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Yes, Mr. President, I will yield.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe we have adequately outlined the reasons why Congress put the TAPS adjustment provision in the Windfall Profit Act in the first place. Alaskan oil is not priced like lower 48 oil, it costs a substantial amount more than lower 48 oil costs to produce and the adjustment provision insures that Alaskan producers and the pipeline owners will be treated fairly with regard to their windfall profit tax liability in light of these unique situations. I want to turn this discussion toward the possible result of the removal of the TAPS adjustment. Basically, the removal of the TAPS adjustment would have a number of negative impacts on the economies, production, and transportation in frontier areas. This means less domestic supply from an area holding 50 percent of U.S. potential recoverable reserves and could prevent development of known reserves that might increase output from TAPS in the short run and assist projects such as the northern tier pipeline. We simply are reducing Alaska's role in assisting national energy security.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I would like to elaborate on the point just made by Senator STEVENS. The removal of the TAPS adjustment will reduce funding available for further exploration and production work in the lower 48 States as well as Alaska. Moreover, it will cast a doubt on the feasibility of obtaining a reasonable return on investment in all frontier activities. Mr. President, it is probably true that at least half of all new U.S. reserves of oil and gas will be found in the Alaskan Arctic—secure, domestic, reliable sources of energy. It is not going to be easy to develop these resources and Lord knows it is not going to be cheap. I yield to the senior Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. The implication of what my good friend from Alaska, Senator MURKOWSKI, has said is most troubling, Mr. President. By repealing the TAPS adjustment, we are creating additional uncertainties that must be faced by industry engaged in frontier oil and gas exploration and production. This will cause a shift in investments away from Arctic development, which is clearly our hope for greater energy independence. Finally—and this is the prospect that troubles me greatly—we have increased the possibility of further modifications to the windfall profit tax. Repeal of the TAPS adjustment creates some serious difficulties, but further modifications that may be under consideration in the House Ways and Means Committee would be dangerously destructive to the need to develop our domestic resources in the Arctic.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Will the Senator yield on that point, Mr. President?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, I will be happy to yield.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. On the subject of oil and gas lease revenues—I believe our colleagues should be aware that 16 Federal lease sales are planned for the Alaska Outer Continental Shelf over the next 5 years. Adjustments in other windfall profit tax provisions could lead to a decrease in both the number of companies bidding on those leases and the size of the bids—possibly by a significant amount. In a single one of those lease sales scheduled for fall of this year, it has been estimated that Federal revenues from this sale could fall from $2.6 billion to $1.4 billion—and that is just one lease sale. Thus, what was intended as a revenue raiser may in fact cost the Federal Government substantial amounts of income. I am also concerned about the implications of its repeal on our endeavors to achieve a greater degree of energy independence, which is, as we all know, inexorably tied to our national security. We know that Arctic Alaska is a key to our energy future, but just how much oil and gas can we expect to find there?

The National Petroleum Council estimates that 24 billion barrels of recoverable but undiscovered oil, as well as 109 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, lie in an area running from the Aleutian chain to North Slope. Now those are just the median estimates in the range of possibilities—the actual amounts could be much higher.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe it is also important to note that any prospects for the discovery of new, giant oil fields of the likes of Prudhoe Bay in the United States are limited to frontier areas in Alaska.

Another point I wish to make goes back to the reason Congress put the frontier windfall profit tax provisions in place. It is, of course, a fact that it is much more difficult and expensive to develop new energy resources in the Arctic. Climatic conditions, remoteness, limited drilling seasons, complex geology, and the need to protect the sensitive Arctic environment all contribute to these higher costs. Without incentives such as the Arctic Circle windfall profit tax exemption in place, Arctic resources will not be developed in the same timeframe—if they will be developed at all.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I believe it is also important to note that current and planned expenditures of billions of dollars by a number of U.S. oil companies in the Arctic were undertaken with the understanding and expectation that oil discovered there would not be subject to the windfall profit tax. Changing the rules of the game now would be inequitable, and it would lead to reductions in planned private sector expenditures resulting in lower domestic production.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I will, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. I have listened to and participated in this colloquy with great interest, and I would like to commend the Senators from Alaska for their thoughtful discourse on this subject. I would take this opportunity to assure my friends from Alaska that I did not vote for the TAPS adjustment repeal in the Finance Committee and I am sure we will take another look at the issue in conference.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I greatly appreciate the remarks of the chairman of the Finance Committee—I find a great deal of encouragement in what he says. And while it had been my plan to offer an amendment to delete the provisions in this bill repealing the TAPS exemption, I will not do so now. I would also like to commend the chairman of the Finance Committee who has labored long and hard to bring this bill before us today.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the remarks of my colleague from Alaska. I agree fully with his assessment of the TAPS adjustment deletion and hope that we can prevent it from becoming law. We simply cannot afford to make shortsighted policy decisions such as this one that earn a minimal amount of revenue while jeopardizing production of vital national energy resources. It is my understanding that this provision is motivated by independent petroleum jobbers seeking punitive measures against Alaska's major producers. This is not a revenue measure, and I hope we can look into the motivation and true effect of the measure prior to conference.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senators in opposing the Finance Committees treatment of the TAPS adjustment. The windfall profit tax was aimed at a particular economic event—a sharp rise in crude oil prices in the world market resulting from the OPEC cartel, and deregulation, which brought those who supported the windfall profit tax, the sharp increase in crude oil prices did not necessarily reflect demand/supply requirements, but reflected at least to some degree, the price level dictated by the cartel. For that reason, it was the decision of Congress and the administration to tax up to 70 percent of crude oil price increases over the controlled price levels.

However, there was a recognition that where a wellhead value was significantly affected by the cost of transporting oil to market, as in the case of the TAPS pipeline, any reduction in the cost of transportation, which might result from expansion or more efficient use of the pipeline, would not constitute a "windfall" in the OPEC sense. Therefore, the TAPS adjustment provided that reductions in the pipeline tariff would be added to the crude oil base price so that the windfall margin subject to taxation would not be increased by pipeline tariff reductions.

One of the proposed extensions of the TAPS transportation system is the Northern Tier Pipeline Co., which was planned to move Alaskan North Slope (ANS) crude from Seattle to the northern tier States and the midcontinent of the United States. The future of the northern tier pipeline is inescapably joined to future crude oil discoveries in Alaska, our brightest oil frontier. The northern tier project will be largely dependent upon Alaskan crude; of the estimated capacity of 933,000 barrels per day, it is expected that at least 600,000 barrels per day would come from ANS crude. New oil must be found and pipeline expansions and extensions must be built. Those expansions and extensions will be built by the companies which discover and develop the new reserves.

Of course, the TAPS adjustment does not apply to the northern tier project; the substantial cost savings that would be brought about by the northern tier project would increase the wellhead value of North Slope crude and that increase of net wellhead value would be subject to the windfall profit tax. Thus, the windfall profit tax itself, was a significant obstacle standing in the path of northern tier. Now the Finance Committee is sending even more adverse signals to the oil pipeline industry and the financial community that is called upon to finance new pipeline projects. That signal is that if the oil industry brings about a more efficient use of transportation facilities, the benefit of that use will not flow to the owners of the resource, but 70 percent of the benefit will be taken by the Federal Government. In the case of Alaskan crude, the State takes 25 percent of the wellhead value; the Federal Government takes 70 percent of the remaining increase in value; the benefit of a company investing in a downstream pipeline facility to provide more efficient transportation of oil to market is becoming almost nonexistent.

The finanical community must feel confident that the northern tier pipeline will be essentially full for at least 20 to 25 years before it will provide the funds to finance that project. Consequently, it is essential that there be stable economic climate which will encourage the oil industry to continue to explore for and develop new reserves on the North Slope. New reserves will be harder to find and more expensive to develop. Elimination of the TAPS adjustment to the industry and the financial community sends a signal of inconsisent tax policy. Under the proposed provision in the bill if you make successful investments, in transportation facilities and increase the value of your product at its source, the Federal Government will take 70 percent of that increased value. That action will be a major disincentive to oil industry participation in the search for additional reserves in the Alaskan North Slope.

If anything, the TAPS adjustment should be expanded. It should provide that any increase in crude oil value resulting from reduction in the cost of crude oil transportation through U.S. pipelines, should be added to the base price, and be exempt from the windfall profit tax. That is the kind of signal that tax policy should send to industry. It should be a signal of incentive and consistency. I will do what I can to assist the Senators in revising this provision at conference with an eye toward restoring the adjustment.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I also rise to join my colleagues in opposing the attempt to repeal the trans-Alaska pipeline adjustment currently in the windfall profit tax bill. The thrust of that adjustment and other "Frontier" provisions in the bill is to inspire additional production from the North Slope of Alaska.

The amendment passed in the committee runs directly counter to this overriding national policy. The TAPS amendment would have us endure great uncertainty regarding the economic factors of exploration and development of the enormous oil and gas resources that the State of Alaska potentially offers the Nation. We must carefully consider such significant charges in policy. There have been no hearings or any type of examination of this issue in either body of Congress. In fact, there was no attempt by the committee late on the night of passage to truly assess the impact of this measure.

For less than $100 million in revenue next year, Congress is jeopardizing production of existing reserves in Alaska, and diminished investment in the overall effort to explore high potential, high cost, Arctic regions.

What disturbs me even more is the fact that this measure was not adopted in an attempt to create equity in tax policy or even to raise substantial revenue.

Clearly, we are tampering with what was already an equitable system for calculating windfall profit taxes from North Slope fields. Our national policy on Arctic oil and gas should be to continue incentives for further development.

Of particular concern to me is the impact on the northern tier project. This is one of a number of important transportation systems that can transport North Slope oil to oil refineries in the lower 48 that need stable supplies of crude. How can the financial community be expected to demonstrate its confidence by investing in such facilities if Congress is signalling its unwillingness to stand behind its commitments of only 2 years past? My point is that not only is oil production from the Arctic hampered through this type of backtracking, the secondary effect is the financial markets simply will not respond as national interest dictates when there is no certainty that investment rules will remain the same and that the huge potential of Alaskan oil will continue to be delivered.

Remember, we are talking about a region providing nearly 20 percent of our entire domestic supply. Projects such as the northern tier pipeline depend on this supply and this project is very important to the energy and economic well-being of my State as well as all others that would be served by northern tier.

I would suggest to the Senators from Alaska and to the chairman that they are not alone in their concern with this amendment. Our national energy policy requires that we evaluate the effects of our actions here on the entire system. Many States need a project like a northern tier that is dependent upon enhanced production from our potential domestic oil and gas regions. Investment stability depends upon a consistent policy.

This is certainly not the effect of this proposed congressional action and speaking for Montanans I join in support of my colleagues who have just spoken in opposition to changes in treatment of the TAPS adjustment. I hope that it is possible to restore the adjustment as the bill moves through Congress.

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, earlier this evening, by unanimous consent, Senators STEVENS, MURKOWSKI, and DOLE entered into a colloquy concerning the bill's elimination of the trans-Alaska pipeline system adjustment to the windfall profits tax.

I understand this is a somewhat lengthy colloquy, but since none of the words were spoken on the floor, it is difficult for me to rebut whatever the Senators from Alaska may be saying in support of the TAPS adjustment in order to balance the record this evening.

However, for the record, I would point out that the three major oil companies who will be forced to pay a higher amount of windfall profits tax because of the committee's elimination of this adjustment, continue to make several arguments to support their cause. They say that repeal of the adjustment double penalizes them for FERC decisions to lower their pipeline tariffs. They say that pipeline transportation savings will be lower if this adjustment is repealed. They say that somehow we are changing the tax rules in the middle of the game. They say that eliminating the TAPS adjustment will send signals that will be harmful to future frontier oil development or even to future oil pipelines.

I have read or heard what these three oil companies have to say, and all of these arguments are easily rebutted: Elimination of the TAPS adjustment simply works to apply the windfall profits tax on the Alaska oil subject to the tax on a basis somewhat closer to that of the oil produced in my State and all other States. It simply gets aid of a phantom freight rate written into the code that no-longer reflects the cost of transporting this oil through the pipeline.

Mr. President, as I said, it is relatively easy to rebut the arguments being made by these three companies, but it is impossible to rebut arguments made by my colleagues tonight when the remarks are included in the RECORD by consent without having been spoken. I will read the RECORD tomorrow and prepare a response. Tonight all I can do is call this situation to the attention of the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks be placed in the RECORD directly following the colloquy I just mentioned.●

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, there is a proposal in the bill about which I am seriously concerned because of its potential adverse impact on the objective of increasing investment in productive assets in the United States.

In the provisions dealing with safe-harbor leases, the legislation is written, in effect, to reduce the amount of foreign tax credit a taxpayer may claim if the taxpayer is a lessee of property under a safe-harbor lease.

The intent of the reform provisions of this bill is to end abuses by some taxpayers. I support this intent, but the provision related to the foreign tax credit throws the baby out with the bath.

The impact of this provision is to create a disincentive to repatriate profits from foreign subsidiaries to invest in the United States. If a taxpayer who has been losing money in the United States brings back foreign dividends from foreign subsidiaries to invest in new equipment in the United States, the taxpayer will be denied credits for the foreign taxes paid on the repatriated income. Alternatively, the taxpayer must give up the right to help finance his domestic investment as a lessee under a safe-harbor lease.

I believe that it is important to reconcile this conflict between the safe-harbor-leasing rules, as amended to end the abuses, and repatriation of foreign profits for reinvestment in the United States. I would hope that an opportunity will be available in conference to work out a rule that would serve as an incentive to repatriate foreign earnings for investment in the United States and permit the taxpayer to utilize the new, restricted safe-harbor-lease rules as in the case of other U.S. taxpayers.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I commend the committee for its efforts to eliminate the abuses of the safe-harbor-leasing provisions. However, in the area of foreign tax credits, the committee appears to have gone off course and the result will adversely affect legitimate leasing transactions or discourage repatriation of foreign profits for investment in the United States. I hope that during the conference on this legislation, it will be possible to reach an agreement which meets the committee's understandable concern that the leasing provisions of last year's bill be tightened up to avoid abuse, but, at the same time, still allows leasing to achieve its original goal of giving unprofitable U.S. operations the capital necessary to modernize.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am sensitive to the issues raised by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Michigan, and look forward to doing our best to resolve them in conference.●

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the requirement contained in this bill that will force employers to provide primary health insurance for their older workers. The bill does exempt certain firms from this requirement by limiting it to employers having 20 or more employees.

However, Mr. President, there seems to be a great deal of confusion over which employers are to be exempted from the new requirement of providing health insurance for the working aged. The press release which the Finance Committee sent out on June 25 announced that the committee had agreed to exempt employers of fewer than 25 regular workers from this new provision. Yet the report language to H.R. 4961 ordered to be printed on July 12 states that only employers of fewer than 20 regular workers will be exempted from this new responsibility.

Senators should first be advised that this bill will only exempt employers of fewer than 20 regular workers. As such, they should also be advised that this bill does not adequately exempt small businesses from the burden of providing health insurance for their older workers.

The medicare working aged proposal simply shifts costs from the Government to private employers. These private employers are going to be faced with a choice of either, one, letting their older workers go, or two, reducing health benefits for all their workers.

Among private employers, small businesses will be least able to accommodate the drastic rise in health costs this bill will mean for them. Thus, small businesses will most likely be forced to let their older workers go.

The vast majority of workers over age 65, Mr. President, work in small businesses. Any movement by small businesses to let their older workers go will have a drastic effect on the already declining participation of those over 65 in the labor force.

In 1950, close to 40 percent of all men aged 65 and over remained in the work force. By 1970, only 27 percent of such older men were working. In 1980, that figure dropped to 19 percent and the figures for 1981 and 1982 are even lower.

But given the shortfall in social security funds, we want to encourage longer work-lives and discourage workers from retiring at age 65. The latest testimony to the Senate and House Aging Committees shows that $10 billion a year could be added to social security; $40 billion to combined Federal, State, and local tax funds; and over $200 billion to our GNP if the same percentage of those over 65 who were working in 1970 were working today. So the last thing we want to do is discourge older workers from staying on the job.

Seven percent of all older workers are employed in firms which have between 20 and 25 full-time employees. By lowering an initial exemption from firms with fewer than 25 regular employees to firms with fewer than 20 regular employees, this bill will adversely affect some 95,200 older workers.

As it stands now, Mr. President, the provision modifying health coverage for the working aged is penny-wise and pound-foolish. Suppose for the sake of argument that those 95,200 older workers I mentioned above were to lose their jobs because their employers could not afford to provide them the same health benefits that they provide to younger workers. If they were just to receive the minimum social security benefit of $122 a month, in 1 year they would cost the old age and survivors trust fund $139,372,800. That is $20 million more than the cost of my amendment over 3 years.

In short, Mr. President, the proposal to make medicare the secondary payor and the company health plan first payor for workers aged 65 to 69 will cost us far more out of the OASDI trust fund if these workers lose their jobs than it will save in the short-term out of the medicare portion of the trust funds.

Mr. President, a recent Harris poll revealed that 50 percent of all retirees want to work. We have every reason to do everything we can to encourage them to do so. For this reason, I oppose modifying health coverage for the working aged.●

EFFECTIVE DATES FOR FACILITIES CONSTRUCTION OF WHICH BEGAN PRIOR TO JULY 1, 1982

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, the bill would deny ACRS—accelerated cost recovery system—with respect to property financed by tax-exempt bonds. Section 223(b)(2)(A)(I) provides an exception for facilities, the construction of which began prior to July 1, 1982. There are several matters I would like to clarify.

Is it the committee's intent that, for example, a project which includes the acquisition, refurbishment, and construction of land, docks and wharves, storage tanks, and related equipment and infrastructures, all as described in the inducement resolution passed prior to the commencement of construction on the project, is to be considered a single "facility" within the meaning of section 223(b)(2)(A)(I)?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TOWER. And is it also the Senator's understanding that if construction of the facility began prior to July 1, 1982, and before the entire facility is completed, certain components of the facility, including components under construction, are sold and new tax-exempt bonds are issued to finance the purchaser's acquisition of such components and completion of the entire facility prior to the facilities being placed in service, the exemption for construction begun before July 1, 1982, would be available and, thus, ACRS would be available to the purchaser with respect to all components of the facility?

Mr. DOLE. That is also correct.●

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am submitting this statement on behalf of Senators BAKER, DANFORTH, and WALLOP, concerning the Dingell-Johnson provisions of the bill.

We have been working with a number of manufacturers who contend that many Taiwanese and Japanese manufacturers are fraudulently reducing their taxes under Dingell-Johnson through use of dummy trading companies. Since the tax is levied at first sale, these manufacturers are able to reduce the amount of tax by having the manufacturing company sell to the trading company at less than the true value and thereby reducing their tax. The profit is then accredited at a later bona fide sale. In addition, they are also able to reduce the amount of their ad valorem tariff payment. The various corporate relationships between these foreign manufacturers and trading companies cast serious doubt as to whether these sales are bona fide.

This situation will be exacerbated by provisons in the Finance Committee bill which broaden the items subject to taxation.

It is crucial that the Treasury Department, and where applicable, the Customs Service, conduct full and expeditious investigations of these potential violations of trade law. Upon completion of these investigations, violators should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

Only this week, Matsui, a Japanese steel company, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to provide fictitious prices to the Customs Service to circumvent the trigger price mechanism. Matsui and its employees engaged in forgery, destruction of documents, preparation of phony invoices, submission of false documents and backdating of documents.

I understand that a similar civil case is pending against one fishing tackle importer. Where evidence is presented, this and other investigations should be broadened to include other companies engaged in these activities. It is my sense and the sense of the other Members on whose behalf I am submitting this statement, that expeditious and prompt investigations be made of these charges. It is also our sense that an amount equal to the amount accruing from any recovery of tariffs or taxes for fraudulent activity be paid into the Dingell-Johnson fund. The hearings scheduled next year to review Dingell-Johnson should be used to review the progress of these investigations and to bring any additional information to the attention of the Treasury Department.

It is important to note that the amounts equal to the amount of the taxes and tariffs which are deposited into the Dingell-Johnson fund have no protectionist intent, but rather are for recreational and other similar purposes. Thus, it is the same American sportsman that purchased the equipment who is penalized by fraudulent efforts to avoid the tax and the tariff. It is for this reason that an amount equal to the amounts recovered through investigations should be placed into the Dingell-Johnson fund.●

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for the tax reforms contained in H.R. 4961, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.

In passing the budget resolution last month, Congress gave the Senate Finance Committee the formidable task of increasing Federal revenues by over $98 billion in the next 3 years. Members in both Houses recognized the need to find sources of substantial revenues in order to reduce the enormous deficits we are now facing. By some estimates, Federal deficits would reach $200 billion annually for the next 3 years if no significant changes are made on both the spending and revenue sides of the budget equation.

Under the able leadership of Senator DOLE, the Senate Finance Committee has not merely met its obligation under the budget resolution, but has developed a sound package of tax reforms that go far in correcting major inequities that exist in our tax laws. The tax bill we are considering today takes bold steps toward making our tax system fairer and simpler. It strengthens the minimum tax on individuals so that persons with high incomes cannot whittle down their tax obligation by combining many tax benefits. It also closes gaping tax loopholes that big businesses have enjoyed for too long. It scales back provisions of the present law that allow some businesses to defer tax payments for up to 10 years, removes tax havens for multinational oil companies, and reduces tax preferences by 15 percent for corporations. These and other loopholes closed by the bill are tax benefits that corporations have taken at the expense of the Federal Treasury and the economy as a whole. Even worse, they have been enjoyed at the expense of the individual taxpayer, whose yearly tax bill has gone up, and up, and up in order to pay for the special breaks given to these big businesses and special interests. Closing these loopholes, in the face of intensive lobbying efforts and high odds at stake for big business, was no easy task to achieve—and it is a welcome reform.

The bill also corrects some of the excesses of last year's tax bill, the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. I supported ERTA as necessary to reduce tax rates for individuals at all income levels and to provide new investment incentives for businesses. I have often stated, however, that last year's bill went too far in piling special interest provisions on top of these basic tax reforms. The bill before us today recognizes that these benefits cannot be tolerated in a time of budget austerity. For example, it substantially reduces—and repeals in 1985—the safe-harbor leasing provisions under which businesses have avoided substantial tax liabilities by selling unused tax benefits. It scales back excessive depreciation provisions that allow some businesses to enjoy negative tax rates, and it eliminates preferences given to certain shareholders.

Third, the bill makes important reforms that are designed to increase taxpayer compliance. The extent of noncompliance with our tax laws is staggering: by Treasury estimates, the revenue lost by the Federal Government from noncompliance was approximately $95 billion in 1981. By 1985, this figure would rise to $133 billion if no change is made in our tax laws. The vast majority of the underpayment is attributable to underreporting of income, to overstatement of deductions, credits, and exemptions, and to a failure to file tax returns. The tax bill seeks to recover some of this revenue through increased information reporting, limited withholding, and strengthened penalties for noncompliance. All these efforts only begin to scratch the surface of the vast noncompliance problem, but they are a necessary first step in recovering these lost billions that are owed to the Federal Government.

Finally, I support the bill on the basis of some elements it does not contain. It does not scale back the individual rate reductions that were passed last year in order to reverse the trend of rising taxes for all taxpayers, at all income levels. It does not affect the indexing provision under which individuals will be freed from automatic tax increases imposed by inflation through "bracket creep." It does not impose an oil import fee. It does not eliminate the basic deductions on which low- and middle-income taxpayers depend to make ends meet. In fact, 85 percent of this bill will not affect the tax burden of the average taxpayer. Instead, most of its provisions are aimed at persons and businesses who are able to afford, but have not been paying, their fair share of taxes.

For these reasons, therefore, I support H.R. 4961. As with any major piece of legislation, there are, of course, particular provisions with which I disagree. One area of particular concern to me is the increased authority that the compliance provisions of the bill give to the Internal Revenue Service. Since coming to Congress, and particularly in my work on the Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, I have been appalled by the many opportunities for abuse of authority by administrative agencies, particularly the IRS. By increasing reporting requirements of both individuals and businesses, and imposing stricter penalties for noncompliance with our tax laws, the IRS will enjoy more authority than ever before, and the potential for abuse of its power is very real.

In passing the compliance provisions, Congress must assure that the agency, in promulgating regulations and enforcing the provisions of this tax bill, will at all times safeguard the due process and privacy rights of taxpayers and will not place undue administrative hardships on businesses, particularly small businesses, and individuals in complying with the tax law. Vigilant and rigorous congressional oversight of the IRS will be more important than ever before to assure that the agency does not exceed the scope of its authority.

Finally, Congress must insure that the IRS is giving taxpayers adequate assistance in knowing what their duties are under the tax laws. Through stiffer penalties and more reporting requirements, the consequences for noncompliance will be very high, and the IRS should provide taxpayers with education and assistance in understanding their tax obligations rather than providing traps for the unwary. This will be especially important for the elderly, taxpayers in rural areas, and undereducated individuals who have difficulty understanding, and cannot afford or have access to persons who can assist them in understanding the complexity of the tax laws.

Recently, we have heard many calls from persons on both sides of the aisle to replace our present tax system with a simpler system that would limit the ability of taxpayers to shield income from taxes through the use of complex and sophisticated tax loopholes and benefits. Such a complete overhaul of our tax system may indeed come to pass at a later date if Congress determines that it would guarantee equity for low- and middle-income taxpayers. The bill that we are voting for today goes far in moving toward these same goals of equity and simplicity in our tax laws, while working within the context of our present Tax Code. It is an important step in the right direction. For these reasons, I believe H.R. 4961 is a necessary package of tax reforms that I urge the Senate to approve.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I intend to vote against H.R. 4961 because I believe there are better ways to make up our revenue shortfall. But, at the same time, I must acknowledge the masterful legislative work of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator DOLE. He has managed to carefully craft a sizable tax increase bill and at the same time to convince a lot of the members of this body, many influential members of corporate America, and members of the press that this bill cuts back unjustified preferences in the Tax Code and improves compliance to insure that everyone pays their fair share of tax.

Last summer, I spoke out against the inequities of the Economic Recovery Tax Act. In addition to the deep tax cuts made by that bill, at the behest of the administration, Congress added further egregiously costly tax benefits to an already sizable tax bill. Among those were the safe-harbor-leasing provision, the "give back" of part of the windfall profits tax to the oil companies, and the indexing provision.

That simultaneous combination of massive tax cuts and massively increased defense spending brought us exactly what the experts predicted—massive deficits. That was not only my prediction; that was also the professional belief of many of the most conservative economists in the Nation including one I greatly admire and respect, Henry Kaufman of Salomon Bros. As he said to the National Press Club in April 1981:

> Massive tax cuts, large leaps in defense spending, and a slowdown in other Government outlays will not, in my opinion, be enough. These measures will place an extraordinary strain on monetary policy, leading to further distortions in financial markets, much higher interest rates, and additional fragility of our financial system.

These large deficits have, in fact, become reality. We are staring at $100 billion plus deficits for this year, next year, and several years down the road. As a result, we have now finished consideration of this year's tax increase bill to offset some of the damage done by last year's massive tax cut bill.

In my opinion, the American people would be better served if instead, we took the tack of doing some major surgery on last year's tax bill rather than adding 700 pages of new tax law to our already complex and convoluted tax code. Frankly, my recommendations include the following:

Repeal of year 3 of the tax cut—the 10 percent due on July 1, 1983;

Repeal the safe-harbor leasing provision;

Repeal the give back of the windfall profit tax to the oil companies;

Repeal other of the excessive tax revenue provisions.

Furthermore, I would cut the growth rate of the defense budget from the Reagan 8.1 percent real growth rate to a 5-percent real growth rate and save $90 billion over 5 years.

But, as things now stand, we will do none of the above. Instead, I believe, we are doing a Band-Aid job on the budget. I foresee this 1982 tax increase bill as the first of other tax increase bills. We gave away entirely too much revenue last summer—revenue that we did not have to give away. Now we are paying the price by piddling with new taxes and closing so-called tax loopholes such as the medical deduction or the telephone excise tax.

Furthermore, just today, Congress added two provisions to the bill that I find especially objectionable: One is the sunset amendment on the cigarette tax; the other is the indexing of capital gains. Both of these latter two amendments do not take effect until 1985, just as the indexing of income taxes in last year's so-called Economic Recovery Tax Act does not take effect until 1985.

This has caused me to wonder. Why this concerted, dedicated effort to enact into law in 1981 and 1982 a whole host of fiscally ruinous measures to take effect in 1985?

The answer, I fear relates to philosphy and the desire of some in this body to impose a staggering economic millstone around the neck of whatever administration that may assume power in 1985. When one begins to consider the revenue losses in 1985 which will be created by the various and sundry provisions written into the 1981 tax bill and this 1982 tax bill which provisions have a delayed effective or trigger date in 1985, one then begins to realize that the President of the United States inaugurated in January 1985 will have an absolutely colossal revenue crisis on his hands the very minute he takes the oath of office. That President will have to pull off a Franklin Roosevelt "First 100 Days" effort simply to undo the delayed sabotage of our Nation's revenue engendered by both the 1981 and this 1982 tax bill.

Thus, as we focus on the revenue shortfall in the next 2 fiscal years, we must remember that we are only talking peanuts. The revenue shortfall beyond that, the one created by all of these provisions with a 1985 effective date, is the revenue shortfall of nightmarish proportions.

Therefore, because this bill could have been written in a far more equitable way and because this bill continues the premeditated mischief begun last year of enacting revenue ruinous provisions with a delayed time bomb date of 1985, I must vote against this bill.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, prior to the passage of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, I would like to make a few remarks.

First, I would like to commend the chairman of the Finance Committee for his diligent efforts in formulating this tax package. Raising taxes is never pleasant nor popular. However Senator DOLE recognized the responsibility of the Finance Committee to implement the targets set for our committee by the budget resolution, which for the record, was fully supported by President Reagan. That responsibility included large spending cuts and tax increases. For the most part, I believe the chairman has crafted a package that is as fair and equitable as possible, both in spending cuts and tax increases.

Second, as many of you know, I have never supported raising taxes. In fact, this is the first time during my tenure as a Member of Congress that I have ever supported a tax increase bill. I have always and will continue to believe that the Government needs to reduce spending, and in particular, control entitlement programs.

However, as a member of the Budget Committee it became apparent that in order to reach a concensus on the budget and obtain substantial spending reductions, it would be necessary to agree to some tax increases.

The majority of the Congress supported that budget resolution, and I believe it is extremely important that we implement it, even though all of us may not like some aspects of that resolution, such as tax increases.

The Finance Committee, in an attempt to craft a spending reduction and tax increase package fully agreed that we should try to meet our target in as fair a manner as possible. In developing a bill to raise $100 billion in taxes over 3 years, we were able to preserve without change the individual rate cuts and indexing which were promised and enacted last year. We were able to raise the needed revenue by emphasizing several tax policy objectives other than raising marginal tax rates. To achieve this, the bill eliminates many unintended benefits and maintains the basic objective of this bill which is fairness to the American people.

We developed a package of measures designed to improve compliance with existing tax laws. It would be extremely unfair to the vast majority of honest taxpayers to increase their taxes without making the utmost effort to collect substantial revenues from those who are not paying what they already owe under existing law.

Also, we were determined to make sure that high income individuals could not avoid paying some tax through the use of various incentive provisions enacted over the years. It is simply not fair for the average income taxpayer to have to pay a huge tax bill, while much wealthier individuals who have the means to invest in tax-sheltered investments are able to pay no taxes at all.

In the area of corporate tax increases, I was not totally pleased with all of the measures that are in the bill, but an attempt was made to try to eliminate unintended benefits as a result of various incentive measures enacted over the years.

In closing, I would like to state that while I believe that it is very important to implement legislation which will install the budget, I do not believe that long-term economic recovery will occur until Congress addresses itself to controlling the 60 percent of the budget which is growing out of control. A capitalist system cannot survive without long-term capital markets. Those capital markets will not be restored until Congress addresses itself not only to putting a budget in place but to also controlling the significant portion of the budget that is not being controlled.

I only hope that the administration and the House of Representatives will want to take responsible action on entitlement reform after the November elections.

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, earlier this year, it became apparent that continuing the current spending levels along with our present tax policies would result in an unacceptably large deficit. Responding to the instability of the economy—the recession, high interest rate levels, and declining inflation—the Senate adopted, during the week of June 21, 1982, the First Concurrent Budget Resolution for fiscal year 1983. Provisions mandated revenue increases of $20.9 billion in fiscal year 1983, $34.2 billion in fiscal year 1984, and $43.9 billion in fiscal year 1985.

The Senate Finance Committee should be commended for the difficult task of developing a package generating these revenue increases. The plan to tighten loopholes, broaden the tax base, and enhance taxpayer compliance affects both individuals and businesses equally. This is a fair and equitable way of spreading the tax increases among the hard working men and women of this country.

Although I would have preferred that we resolve the budget crisis by reducing spending rather than increasing taxes, I support the revenue increases contained in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982, H.R. 4961. This tax policy plays an essential role in attempting to reduce our budget deficit while maintaining the integrity of President Reagan's economic recovery program. We must generate enough revenue through taxes to operate the Federal Government so borrowing can be reduced. Government borrowing must be reduced so that interest rates can come down to more acceptable levels for all Americans. This is the first substantive legislative effort by the Senate toward bringing the deficit under control. It is important that we revamp our current tax system and strive for fairness and equity for all taxpayers.

The present tax code has become a burden on the economy, relying almost completely on taxpayer compliance. Over the past several years, the special deductions, exclusions, and credits have had the overall effect of adding increased complexity and less equity to the tax system. Eliminating tax loopholes and special deductions, as this bill does, is a step in the right direction. I am pleased that the bill contains a provision directing the Secretary of the Treasury to study the advisability of developing an alternative tax system. A flat tax system is an alternative which I believe should be considered. It would reduce the complexity of our present system as well as improve equity and efficiency. Such a system would save billions of dollars in tax preparation costs. It would also eliminate the economic distortions which credits and deductions impose on taxpayer behavior. Finally, I believe American productivity would be increased.●

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I must oppose adoption of H.R. 4961 on several grounds. First, I believe that some of the spending cuts are unfair and unsound. This bill will increase the out-of-pocket health care costs for millions of elderly Americans who need skilled nursing care in their home, or who must visit the doctor or purchase a medical appliance.

I am especially troubled by the prospect of copayments for home health care. This provision can only be counterproductive from a health policy, as well as an economic standpoint. Home health care services are most frequently used by the oldest, sickest, and poorest members of American society. Imposing new charges for these services will only encourage them to resort to more and lengthier hospital stays thereby making the whole medicare program more costly.

The provision that shifts the costs of these medicare programs to the States is also unwise. The net effect of this change is to require the States either to reduce medicaid services for everyone or to increase their medicaid budget. Given the fiscal problems of most of our States we all know this latter alternative is simply not feasible. Last year's budget cuts prevent the States from maintaining their existing medicaid programs, let alone expanding them in the face of this new onslaught. So what this bill in fact says to the poor, the old, and the sick is that they are going to see health services cut back even further. Mr. President, to this Senator, such an outcome is simply unacceptable.

Second, I see little evidence that the proponents of this legislation are prepared to acknowledge the origins of the serious problems confronting our economy. Yet understanding the cause of our present economic difficulties is essential to developing sustainable, effective solutions for the long haul.

What are the origins of the problem? In my judgment our economy's current poor performance and dubious prospects are directly attributable to the imbalance in our fiscal and monetary policies.

Last year, Congress adopted a 3-year tax cut that reduced Federal receipts by $750 billion over a 5 year period. We also voted to increase defense spending by $150 billion, while cutting nondefense programs by only $135 billion. Taken together, these actions committed us to a highly stimulative fiscal policy at a time when inflation was widely perceived as the primary threat to our economic well-being.

To counter the inflationary thrust of its tax and defense programs, the administration urged, and the Federal Reserve implemented, an unprecedentedly tight monetary policy. Relying exclusively on tight money to combat inflation has produced the record high interest rates that are choking off growth and laying the foundation for protracted economic stagnation here an abroad.

Because our fiscal and monetary policies are working at cross purposes, the much touted supply-side tax cuts have not led to the surge in work, saving, and investment we were promised. Instead, they have produced record high interest rates, record unemployment and the worst recession in 50 years. And if the administration decides that the November elections require them to ease up on monetary policy for awhile, we face the threat of renewed inflation and further erosion of the public's confidence in government.

The bill before us simply does not address these problems. At most, it takes a few modest steps toward correcting the excesses in last year's tax bill. What it does not do is acknowledge that we would be much better off today if we had reduced spending in 1981 and limited ourselves to a 1-year tax cut fairly designed to offset social security tax hikes and bracket creep. Only by admitting our past mistakes can we avoid deluding ourselves into settling for short run solutions to what are in fact long-run problems.

I am also disturbed by the nature of the tax increases we are voting on. While some the bill's provisions merit the label "tax reform," many of them unfairly and unnecessarily burden low and middle income taxpayers. These are the very groups hardest hit by the recession and least able to insulate themselves from its effects.

Along with many of my Democratic colleagues, I offered amendments to modify the most unfair elements of the spending cuts and tax increases reported by the Finance Committee. On the tax side, my amendment deleted the increased excise taxes on cigarettes and telephone services. It eliminated the provisions raising the floor for deductible medical expenses and casualty losses from 3 percent to 7 percent of adjusted gross income and increasing the unemployment tax for business. Each of these provisions imposes an unfair burden on those members of society who are most affected by the recession and who are least able to bear the additional tax burden.

On the spending side, the amendment deleted provisions imposing higher out-of-pocket costs to older Americans in the medicare program and making State governments responsible for the cost of insuring doctors' fees and other nonhospital expenses in the medicare program.

To more than offset the loss of revenues from these changes, my amendment also specified that the third year of the 1981 tax cut would be modified when it takes effect next July 1. As modified, the full tax cut would go to all families with incomes under $46,500. A smaller percentage would go to families with incomes ranging from $46,500 to $78,700, and for families with incomes above $78,700, the tax cut would be deferred until Congress balances the budget. My reason for structuring the modification in this way is that I do not believe it is too much to ask taxpayers with incomes above $78,700 to defer their tax cut till we balance the budget if their doing so enables us to avoid increased costs for medicare, for small businesses, for American workers struggling to make ends meet. On the contrary, I think it is only fair that the burden of coping with the recession be fully shared by all. Unfortunately, all these provisions were defeated.

Notwithstanding my objections to the bill, I am encouraged that the supply siders' willingness to correct at least some of ERIA's excesses signals a new, more promising direction. Hopefully, it signals understanding that from the economy's standpoint it is not just cutting taxes that is important. What matters most is the way we cut taxes. There is no free lunch. We cannot afford to lower taxes unless we close loopholes at the same time. Failing to recognize this fact got us into the mess we are in today. If and when we can acknowledge this we will be taking a major step toward a new tax policy that guarantees Americans the fair and efficient tax laws they need and deserve.

WITHHOLDING INTEREST AND DIVIDEND INCOME

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment now before us, offered by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN).

The issue of withholding interest and dividend income has been before this Chamber in the past and I opposed it then. The reasons I opposed it in past years is still valid today: Why push off onto the private sector a job the Internal Revenue Service is unwilling to do itself?

That is the major question before us today as we consider the Kasten amendment. We know that for many years financial institutions and dividend-issuing corporations have been required to submit Form 1099 to IRS, detailing the interest paid and the dividends mailed out each year to each saver or stockholder. The IRS has had this information for years. But they have chosen not to use it to enforce the law that requires all Americans to pay taxes on this type of investment income. IRS has not chosen to use this data because they maintain it is not cost effective for them to do so. Let me repeat that: It is not cost effective for them to do so.

The bill before us tonight makes the assumption that if it is too costly for the Government, that the private sector ought to do it. That is the most novel form of contracting-out for Government services that I have ever heard of.

This is the reason that I have opposed this before. Collection of income taxes is the legitimate function of Government. We should not pawn that responsibility off on the private sector. That is reason enough to oppose withholding on interest and dividend income, but there are a few others I would just like to cite.

There seems to be some concern that the actual revenue estimate for this section is overestimated by as much as $3 billion. I cannot vouch for any of the revenue estimates used on this section, but mention has been made of it here tonight. It causes me concern and I would not want to include a section in this bill that has a questionable revenue estimate.

The economy is too much in need of Federal fiscal responsibility for us to play around with numbers. We know of ways we can indeed reach the nearly $5 billion that we are told withholding will raise. I would like to mention one area where I would like to see the revenue raised. Should this amendment pass, thereby knocking the withholding out of the bill, I will suggest the gasoline tax as an alternative revenue source. I realize the parliamentary problem before us. A gasoline tax would not be germane under the rules by which this bill is being considered. Should the Kasten amendment carry, though, my colleagues may wish to modify this rule—as we are permitted to do by appealing the ruling of the Chair—and make consideration of such an amendment germane.

GASOLINE TAX

Increasing the gasoline tax would be a viable alternative for offsetting the revenues that would be lost if the withholding provisions are eliminated. My colleagues should be well aware that the gasoline tax has not been raised since 1959. There has not been a single change in the tax since then to account for inflation. If inflation had been considered, we would see today about a 12 cent tax. Obviously, a more realistic tax rate is needed. According to administration estimates, for every 1 cent increase in the tax on gasoline, there is approximately $1 billion in additional revenues. In other words, a 5 cent tax would more than offset the revenues expected from the withholding provisions.

Yet, the benefits of such a tax go far beyond simply a quick fix source of revenue. It could help tackle some of our more basic economic problems. A gasoline tax is expected to have a strong effect on further dampening consumption, and thereby reducing our oil imports. Although we have made dramatic reductions in our oil imports over the past year, we still remain highly vulnerable to disruptions in the Middle East. Perhaps, more importantly, we continue to see an annual oil import bill of close to $7.6 billion, which would better be spent in the United States, stimulating jobs and adding to our economic recovery. The Congressional Research Service has estimated a 13 cent tax on gasoline at $1.30 a gallon would reduce imports by 5 percent in the short run and 10 percent over time.

On July 22 I met with Illinois Road Builders Association representatives, Ed Monoscalco and Larry Lucas, as well as Illinois general contractors, W. B. Salzman and Vincent P. Bongiovanni. Chief among their concerns was the need for an increased gasoline tax to fund new construction and reconstruction of our Nation's highways.

Gasoline tax revenues could help our Nation's highways and mass transit systems from further deterioration. The highway system is critical to the health of our economy. According to the Department of Transportation, 93 percent of all trips, 75 percent of all freight movements (by value) and 65 percent of all military shipments take place on the highway system. This is a system in which more than 4,000 miles, or 10 percent of the system, is in need of immediate resurfacing or replacement. Similarly, as GAO investigations have shown, bridges across the country are crumbling and our mass transit systems are decaying.

The time is ripe for such a tax. Because gasoline prices are relatively stable, people and businesses will be able to more easily adapt to a few pennies in price. These few pennies can be viewed as an insurance policy against future dramatic price increases or long gasoline lines. Indeed, these are pennies which will stay in the U.S. economy rather than dollars flowing to OPEC. In addition, over time a drop in imports can help tame the price of world oil, in turn dampening our own inflationary problems. Furthermore, as the price increased spurs conservation and encourages the trend toward more fuel efficient cars, alternative energy sources, such as alcohol fuels, will be given greater opportunity to develop.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks the CRS compliation of revenue estimates from a gasoline tax, along with a copy of an editorial which appeared several months ago in the Chicago Sun-Times. The article points out very clearly that we have a rare opportunity right now to break our addiction to a $7.6 billion oil habit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. President, aside from the two points I have already made against withholding, there are several others that have factored in my decision to support the Kasten amendment.

As I implied earlier, there will be a tremendous cost to banks, savings and loan associations, and credit unions. Start-up costs for these financial institutions will be as much as $1.5 billion. At a time when we hear daily from S. & L. executives about the shaky nature of many savings institutions, now is not the time to load them with new regulatory burdens and more redtape. That is what this section of the bill would do. It flies in the face of our strong congressional effort—one I have supported and encouraged for years—to cut Federal regulations.

An added and highly important aspect of this debate is the effect the withholding will have on savings and investment. It is unlikely—to say the least—that withholding will encourage Americans to save more. After all, withholding will cut their return on investments and may convince some marginal savers to just spend their interest income rather than have the Government automatically take it.

There are certainly ways in which the law can be enforced so that the 10 to 15 percent of returns that do not pay their complete tax on investments will be caught. I strongly support compliance with the law and this legislation provides some new tools to increase the measure of compliance. We should look to these means first and only if they should fail should we consider turning to the use of withholding.

I urge my colleagues to support the Kasten amendment.

RAISE THE FEDERAL GAS TAX

The worldwide oil glut is forcing OPEC and other petroleum producers to cut their prices. Gasoline prices are dropping, too. After nine rough years of steadily rising fuel costs, that's good news, right? not entirely. Reagan administration officials say oil supplies are up primarily because recessions here and abroad have cut demand—less because of conservation and energy efficiency. When the slump ends, renewed industrial and individual demands will soak up the glut.

We wish that analysis were wrong. By now, Americans should be well into a new era of conservation awareness that would outlast the recession. But apparently we are not. Lower gasoline costs seem to be reviving consumers' interest in big cars at the expense of conservation.

Auto dealers and others say that new-car buyers are stressing dependability over fuel economy. That's a worrisome shift. Two years ago 33 percent of car buyers listed fuel economy as their top concern. Fewer than half of those still rank economy first.

What foolishness. Such lack of concern will only strengthen OPEC's hand again and skyrocket all energy prices to new levels.

Although big cars do get better mileage than they once did, full-size models still gulp more fuel—especially in city driving—than their smaller brethren. But there is a way to limit our myopic love affair with big cars:

Raise the federal gasoline tax.

That levy has been stuck at 4 cents a gallon since 1959. An increase of 4 or 5 cents a gallon, once urged by Transportation Secretary Drew Lewis, would generate billions for highway repair and mass transit, and possibly help reduce soaring federal deficits.

And it would remind motorists of an essential fact: Fuel misers can still help ease our depencence on foreign oil barons.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Congress frequently passes new tax legislation. Some might say that Congress changes the tax laws too frequently. Certainly there is something to be said for leaving our tax laws alone for a few years so that businesses and individuals would know what was in store and not have the uncertainty of constantly changing laws. But recent tax law changes will lead to better performance of the economy and this bill, H.R. 4961, is no exception.

Just last year we passed one of the most important tax bills ever considered by Congress. It reduced taxes for individuals and business and gave back to all Americans more of their hard-earned salaries for use in consumption and saving as each taxpayer saw fit. We returned money to the pockets of all taxpayers and we enacted a number of new incentives to spur savings and investment in our economy. On the business side, last year's tax reduction put in place a modern depreciation system that brings our own tax system up to date with the tax system of our economically successful allies like Japan and West Germany.

Last year's tax cut was based on the premise that the private sector should not have an ever-increasing burden of taxation placed on it. Without the passage of last year's tax cut, revenues as a percent of our gross national product would have climbed to 24 percent by 1987. That would have been a steady rise upward from a historical level of about 19 percent to 20 percent. Like spending, revenues have been gobbling up an ever larger share of our national economy. But with the 1981 tax cut, this enormous tax burden has begun to be reduced and under the laws now on the books, revenues will be only 18 percent of GNP by 1987. That is immense progress on the tax front and I believe it will ultimately help put the economy on a high productivity, low inflation course.

Now this year, we are confronted with a different economic picture than we were last year. Most importantly, inflation has been substantially subdued. Rather than running at the double digit rates of 12 percent and 13 percent that it did in 1979 and 1980, inflation last year dropped to 8.9 percent and in the first 6 months of this year, it has fallen even further to about 3 percent. Real progress has been made against inflation, which just a year ago was the major economic concern mentioned by my Illinois constitutent.

Interest rates have surfaced as the primary economic concern in Washington these days. Although a look at interest rates over the past 2 years reveals that not all rates are higher today than they were in 1980. Some are in fact lower. But despite the relative decline in interest rates in recent months, they are still entirely too high. Our economy cannot function when there is a prime rate of 16 percent or more. It may be better than the prime rate of 21 percent we knew a few years ago, but it is too high for business that rely on that credit for daily operations and expansion.

Economists have told us time and again that there is one source for these high interest rates, namely, the Federal budget deficit. The 1970's saw cumulative Federal deficits of over $400 billion. We were not anywhere near a balanced budget in those years. Then this year the largest budget deficits in the Nation's history were projected by the President in his budget message last winter. Budget deficits in the magnitude of $100 to $200 billion were foreseen for several years into the future.

There could be only one responsible congressional reaction to budget projections of this magnitude: Cut spending and raise revenues enough to close that gap that was in turn keeping interest rates high.

The bill that is before us today, H.R. 4961, is part of that response. None of us here today relish the thought of raising taxes. But we have an extraordinary challenge before us. We simply must undercut the high interest rates plaguing the economy. That is agreed by all of us here to be the No. 1 priority.

The Senate began this year with a plan to reduce those deficits. It is a combination of spending reductions and modest tax increases. This bill before us today is the first piece of that legislative package that gives substance to our pledge in the budget resolution to rein in that deficit. Some observers in the financial markets have said they are skeptical, that Congress was not serious in its efforts to curb the deficit. This bill proves them wrong.

The Senate budget resolution passed by Congress last month directs us to raise nearly $100 billion in revenues in the next 3 years. H.R. 4961 will do that by broadening the tax base and improving the compliance with existing tax laws. This bill also makes substantial cuts in a wide range of spending programs within the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee. In fact, the emphasis in the Senate's plan calls for the preponderance of deficit-closing measures to fall in the spending category.

The new revenues raised in the bill account for only 26 percent of the total of $378 billion in deficit reduction called for in the budget resolution. Most of that deficit reduction comes from controlling authorizations and appropriations and from the favorable economic consequences we expect will flow from firm congressional action to make these changes.

The tax bill before the Senate is designed so that about 85 percent of the increased revenues will come from provisions that will not affect the tax burden of the average taxpayer. Furthermore, three-fourths of the increased revenues come from improved compliance and measures to broaden the tax base.

I want to strongly commend Senator DOLE and the Senate Finance Committee for putting together a bill that meets the mandate of the Congress in raising modest revenues to close the deficit. They have done an exceptional job of addressing the Tax Code and in drawing up a number of provisions that will make the tax system fairer and more equitable.

The rest of the $378 billion in budget reductions mandated by the budget resolution will be addressed by Congress in the near future. Today is the deadline for congressional committees to report their savings and I anticipate that legislation will be on the floor in a few weeks.

I have generally supported the Finance Committee's legislation these last few days, although I disagreed with the committee's plan to force financial institutions to collect interest and dividend income through withholding. I have addressed my concerns about that provision in remarks earlier so I will not belabor them here. I supported Senator KASTEN's effort to remove this section from the bill, but we failed by a vote of 47 to 50. Had it succeeded, I know we could have found a number of ways to make up the revenue loss. A nickel increase in the Federal tax on gasoline, for example, would have raised more than the revenue forecast to be raised by dividend and interest withholding. So I parted ways with the committee on that point, but otherwise supported the outlines of this bill.

This bill makes it clear that the Senate supports low taxes for all Americans as long as everyone pays a fair share of taxes. It addresses a number of important issues with regard to tax equity. It should play a major role in bringing down interest rates and reviving the economy.

ACCELERATED CORPORATE TAX PAYMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Finance Committee bill contains a provision which will require the acceleration of estimated corporate tax payments in order to avoid the underpayment of estimated tax penalty. The provision provides that for all corporations, for 1983 and thereafter, the amount of estimated tax payments required in order to avoid the underpayment penalties will be increased from 80 percent to 90 percent of current year's tax liability. In addition, after 1985, a large corporation will not be able to avoid the underpayment of estimated tax penalty by basing its estimated tax payments on the corporation's prior year's tax liability.

It has come to the attention of this Senator that the acceleration of estimated tax payments may cause a hardship for some retail corporations. These corporations generally have significant fluctuations in income from year to year. In addition, most of the income of some retail corporations may be obtained through the sale of goods over a relatively short period of time.

This Senator is concerned that the accelerated corporate tax payment provision of H.R. 4961 not cause undue hardship on any corporation because of its unique circumstances. It is my intention to study this provision carefully before going to conference with the House on H.R. 4961.

TAXPAYER BILL OF RIGHTS PROVISIONS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of three related amendments which are critical to insure greater protections for American taxpayers. These amendments were among those contained within a larger legislative package collectively known as the Taxpayer Bill of Rights, which was the subject of hearings in my Subcommittee on Oversight of the Internal Revenue Service. They were adopted in the Republican caucus prior to Finance Committee markup. I plan to introduce the entire package soon and will attach it as an amendment to the next tax bill.

During those hearings, it became increasingly apparent that additional protections were necessary to strengthen the public's perception of fairness in our tax system and in those who administer our tax laws. In my view, these provisions help to accomplish that goal—and should be adopted.

The first of these measures would require the Internal Revenue Service to give taxpayers information about their rights. Although this may seem overly simplistic, it is a valuable tool to make sure taxpayers are aware of their legal standing, and of their options and requirements. Second, before the Internal Revenue Service could seize a taxpayer's property, it would be required to send the final notice of tax deficiency by certified registered mail—guaranteeing proper notification. Finally, after a taxpayer has paid his tax deficiency, any lien on his property must be discharged within 30 days. This measure is crucial to force the sometimes slow-moving Federal bureaucracy to move in an expeditious fashion.

These measures will go far in aiding taxpayers in their dealings with the IRS and grant them broader protections. By more specifically defining taxpayer's rights, I am confident the passage of such provisions will help develop a greater feeling of cooperation and trust with the Internal Revenue Service, and subsequently, lessen any resentment the public harbors toward the service.

I hope all of my colleagues will join me in this effort. I welcome their support of this initiative.●

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I commend Senator DOLE and his able staff for addressing a problem of potentially great magnitude to my State and 20 other States. These States make payments to elderly clients which permit those older persons to hire people to provide basic care. The people who provide the care to the elderly clients are called chore workers. They perform such services as caring for yards, helping with laundry, giving the elderly baths, running errands, and shopping for those individuals. The State provides the elderly person with a sum of money to cover the cost of these services. This program has been very effective in Iowa in creating a greater sense of community by encouraging people to help their elderly neighbors. Also, it has the added advantage of providing certain basic care to elderly clients enabling them to stay out of nursing homes and other institutions.

The classification of these workers for tax purposes has long been a problem for both the Internal Revenue Service and the States. The IRS has argued that States should be withholding FICA and FUTA taxes on the payments made to elderly clients. The States maintain that they are not employing the elderly person, rather the elderly person is employing others to provide basic services. The States further argue that they do not know the identity of these service providers. Discovering the identity of these service providers and programing that information into their computers would cost more than they currently spend on the program. The States argue persuasively that these administrative costs are greater than the cost of the program. This dilemma prompted Congress to include health care programs within the moratorium on independent contractors which expired at the end of last month.

Senator DOLE'S new bill on independent contractors contained within this measure sets forth a series of safe harbor requirements to determine whether or not an individual is an independent contractor or an employee. Unfortunately, determining whether or not the elderly person or the service provider is an independent contractor or an employee would not alleviate the States' problem. Although it appears that under Senator DOLE'S tests chore workers and elderly clients might not be independent contractors, even if both were considered independent contractors the elderly client would have reporting responsibilities. If the elderly client made payments over $600 annually to any one service provider, he or she would have to file a form 1099 with the Internal Revenue Service each year stating the amount of the payments and providing the name, address, and social security number of the service provider to whom the payments were made.

Senator DOLE agreed to modify his bill to exempt home health programs from the definition of employment for employment tax and information reporting purposes. These home health care programs are exempt from the definition of employment only if cash grants are made to the elderly or disabled persons which are not more than 20 times as great as the State's maximum daily allowable nursing home reimbursement under title XIX of the Social Security Act. Also, elderly clients receiving cash grants may not have monthly incomes over 250 percent of the monthly SSI payment standard under title XVI of the Social Security Act. In addition, service providers must be supervised by the grant recipient, in this case the elderly client, although State and local employees may provide some insubstantial services. Finally, the State must tell the client to notify service providers of their Federal tax responsibilities. In my view, States should also instruct elderly clients that they should tell the service provider that no social security is being withheld from his check; consequently, this work experience will not contribute to the accumulation of quarters necessary to qualify for social security. I thank Senator DOLE for accommodating my suggestion and eliminating these home health care workers from the definition of employment. The State of Iowa expressed the fear that the excessive recordkeeping that might be required by the States would render their program too costly to administer. Discontinuation of this program would result in a net loss to the Federal Treasury. The average service provider in Iowa receives $266.81 per month. The entire cost of the program is financed by the State. If home service is discontinued and the elderly individual is unable to provide for himself at home, that person is often forced into a nursing home. The Federal and State medicaid costs are $555.61 per month. This combined Federal and State contribution is much more expensive than the foregone FICA and FUTA taxes.

Not only would such a policy be more expensive in economic terms, it would be very costly in human terms. The revenue numbers are not as compelling as the desirable public policy of keeping elderly individuals in their own homes as long as possible. Numerous studies have found that the elderly who remain in their own neighborhoods have much better health than their counterparts who are placed in nursing homes or are receiving other forms of institutionalized care. The advantage of being surrounded by friends and the dignity of providing for oneself in old age are powerful factors in keeping our Nation's elderly a healthy and vibrant force in our communities. This provision would help our 20 States pursue that goal.

I thank the members of the committee for adopting this suggestion and permitting these important programs to continue. Senator DOLE'S support of this provision and his staff's willingness to work on a solution to this problem have made my support of the independent contractors provision unequivocal.●

FLAT-RATE TAX

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I intend to support this tax bill, but with one caveat. There is much work to be done to reform the existing Tax Code. The present code has outlived any usefulness it might have had. It is in major need of repair. I hope this body will recognize that need, and assist several of us on the Senate Finance Committee who wish to conduct an exhaustive study of how to construct a fair, simple, and efficient tax code that will help facilitate our transition to an aggressive economy.

Several proposals have surfaced in Congress in recent months which address the need for tax reform. Each one has merit and, although I believe we are being premature in considering the "form" of tax reform before an analysis of the problem, I embrace the thrust of each of those proposals in that they all move toward tax simplicity and fairness.

Mr. President, there are other more fundamental questions to be answered before we can establish the ideal Tax Code. We must fully understand why tax reform is necessary and what transitional problems might arise. We must understand the nature of the problem first, identify our economic goals, and then construct a tax system that will help us achieve those goals. Half the battle will be won if we simply ask the right questions.

Our first objective is to understand the nature of our existing Tax Code. Much has been said about the erosion of our tax base. But there is a more fundamental problem: We simply tax the wrong things.

We tax savings and investment, but we encourage consumption and debt. Individual decisions are made on the basis of what makes good tax sense rather than good economic sense. We have an economy bent on debt and consumption. That is no way to build an economy. It leads to bankruptcy, to a destruction of the economy such as we are experiencing now.

If we are to make a successful transition to an aggressive, dynamic economy, then we must first recognize and correct the bias in our tax structure toward debt and consumption. We must shift the tax away from work and savings. The decisions of individuals must make good economic sense as well as good tax sense. The two should be interchangeable.

What form should such a tax code take? Should it be a flat-rate system? A progressive one? A gross income tax? A consumption tax? These are questions which must be answered by detailed study.

There are, however, immediate economic points to be made for a flat-rate system over a progressive one. A progressive tax system has an adverse effect on the two most important prerequisites for a dynamic economy; namely, healthy production and capital formation. A flat-rate system, on the other hand, is compatible with these.

Progressivity retards future production by maintaining high marginal tax rates along the tax ladder. Assuming the world is not static, the effects of any tax code should be weighed against future income, not present income. For example, you can tax a millionaire at a 50-percent rate the first year, but that millionaire will not be foolish enough the second year to generate a similar amount of work effort.

Even if the top rate were 25 or 28 percent, those taxed at lower rates would suffer a disadvantage to earning more. Why tax someone more heavily just because he works a few more hours, days or weeks than his neighbor? Proponents of a progressive tax system fail to take the effects of future income into account.

Progressivity also discourages capital formation by short circuiting the dynamic of creating capital. New and innovative businesses often bring in large profits early on in their existence. These businesses are the source of future jobs and growth. They need capital to develop. Yet we tax their profits at alarming rates in a progressive system, thereby choking off jobs, productivity, and capital. Without a turnover in capital through these innovative ventures, we are undermining the key to a dynamic economy. Furthermore, we are stifling competition, which gives the edge to large, existing firms. This is certainly no way to build an aggressive economy.

A flat-rate tax must be perceived as the ultimate in fairness because it eliminates the disadvantage facing lower income earners and small businesses. The dynamic of an economy should be from the bottom up, meaning that the smallest entities should be given the biggest break. Only a low flat-rate tax can provide that break.

There are also immediate economic points to be made in favor of lower income tax rates in exchange for certain credits and deductions. Credits and deductions are taken at the expense of savings. They allocate resources to inefficient sectors, causing a supply/demand disequilibrium in those sectors.

In a tax code riddled with credits and deductions, we consume goods before we produce them, in effect. Who needs to work this week for next week's purchases when we can work next week for this week's purchases, and get a tax break? Why save for college tuition when there are loans and grants available that are a more attractive offer? Why save now to buy a car next year, when you can get one now, pay later, and get a tax break? The point is that credits and deductions, like progressivity in a tax code, retard the ability of the economy to operate efficiently.

The chief problem with a flat-rate tax is not economic, for clearly a flat tax stands superior to a progressive one, or to one marked by credits and deductions.

The problem we face with the flat tax is getting there.

What is needed at this time more than anything else is analysis and studies of the impact of a flat tax on all the various sectors of the economy. We must fully understand what the effects will be on the economy when credits and deductions are eliminated. We must understand its effects on small businesses, small savers, impoverished industries, corporations, and so on. Without such an exhaustive analysis, adoption of any form of a broad-based, low-rate system from our current high-rate, narrow-based system would cause serious dislocation and transition problems.

Our studies must show the exact size of various tax bases and tax rates that would be feasible. We must determine if these different systems are administrable. We must have thorough debate on considerations of fairness and equity.

The Senate Finance Committee will conduct hearings this fall on the feasibility of certain flat-tax systems. The hearings will give us an opportunity to explore and understand all the problems associated with our tax reform goals.

I commend the Finance Committee chairman (Mr. DOLE) on his insight into the enormous complications involved in the process of tax reform, and for his responsiveness to the need to hold hearings. I hope that my other colleagues, both on the committee and in the Senate as a whole, will join in this effort to correct what is clearly a monumental problem.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

CHURCH RETIREMENT INCOME ACCOUNTS

● Mr. BENTSEN. I would like to make an inquiry about the church plan provisions of H.R. 4961. I understand the bill would permit a church, including a church pension board, to establish or maintain retirement income accounts which are to be treated as annuity contracts described in section 403(b) for purposes of the Code.

Mr. DOLE. I agree with the Senator's interpretation of the bill. In addition, church retirement income accounts are not required to contain a guaranteed annuity rate table just as custodial accounts described in section 403(b)(7) are not required to provide guaranteed annuity rate tables.●

NEW RESERVE COMPUTATION METHOD

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I have a question concerning the committee's amendment relating to life insurance company taxation. The particular provision limits the amount deductible for reserves to the extent attributable to so-called guaranteed excess interest. My question is whether the limitation has any effect when a company sets the premiums it will charge on the basis of anticipated earnings.

Mr. DOLE. The new reserve computation method is limited in scope to contracts which provide for the accumulation of interest that is payable to policyholders. For example, the new reserve computation method would be applicable to so-called excess interest contracts where the interest is separately stated and guaranteed in excess of State law valuation rate beyond the end of the taxable year. The new method would not be applicable, however, to policies which do not guarantee a separately identifiable excess interest component beyond the taxable year. For example, the provision would not apply to annuity contracts purchased by a qualified pension plan primarily to provide periodic retirement benefits due under the plan to participants.●

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, section 223(b)(2)(A)(ii) of the bill provides that the amendments denying ACRS depreciation to certain property financed with the proceeds of certain tax-exempt obligations shall not apply to facilities with respect to which a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures was entered into prior to July 1, 1982. Furthermore, section 223(b)(2)(B)(ii) of the bill provides that such amendments do not apply to facilities financed by the proceeds of certain refunding obligations if significant expenditures are made with respect to the facility prior to January 1, 1983. May I ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee if I am correct to assume that "significant expenditures" are generally expenditures for the facilities financed with tax-exempt obligations equal to 20 percent of the estimated cost of the facilities financed with tax-exempt obligations, but may be lower than 20 percent in cases involving the construction of very large and costly facilities where the construction of such facilities takes place over several years.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. While "significant expenditures" will ordinarily be 20 percent of the cost of the facilities financed with tax-exempt bonds, a lower percentage may be appropriate under certain circumstances where such facilities are very large, costly, and are constructed over a period of several years.●

ACRS DEPRECIATION

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, section 223(b)(2)(a) of the bill provides that the amendments denying ACRS depreciation to certain property financed with the proceeds of certain tax-exempt bonds shall not apply to facilities the construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of which began prior to July 1, 1982, or with respect to which a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures was entered into prior to July 1, 1982. Section 223 (b)(2)(B) of the bill provides that in the case of certain facilities financed by the proceeds of certain refunding obligations, the amendments denying ACRS depreciation do not apply if significant expenditures are made prior to January 1, 1983. May I ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee if I am correct in assuming that in the case of facilities financed by the proceeds of such refunding obligations, the amendments also shall not apply if the provisions with respect to commencement of construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of the facilities prior to July 1, 1982, or a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures having been entered into prior to July 1, 1982, are met?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; the distinguished senior Senator from Delaware is correct. The issuance of the refunding obligations will not cause facilities financed by the original obligation to be ineligible for ACRS depreciation if construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of the facilities prior to July 1, 1982, or a binding agreement to incur significant expenditures with respect to such facilities was entered into before July 1, 1982, and provided the refunding complies with the requirements of present law.●

EXCEPTIONS TO ACCELERATED COST DEDUCTION RESTRICTION

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee whether the exceptions to the effective dates on the restrictions on the availability of accelerated cost recovery deductions for property with respect to which tax-exempt financing is provided that is found at section 223(b)(2)(A) (i) and (ii) applies to all facilities qualifying for those exceptions including certain new air or water pollution control facilities.

Mr. DOLE. Yes, the Senator is correct. Provided the facilities that are financed with tax-exempt obligations qualify for the exceptions, it does not matter whether or not they are air or water pollution control installed in connection with a plant or property in operation before July 1, 1982.●

SOLID WASTE DEPOSIT FACILITIES

● Mr. ROTH. If the Senator would yield, I wish to ask if the Senator could clarify certain provisions in section 223(a) of the bill. My inquiry relates to the exception for solid waste disposal facilities which appears on page 283 of the bill—section 168(f)(12)(C)(ii) of the Code.

Am I correct that a solid waste disposal facility which receives waste from individual residents, commercial, industrial, municipal, utility, agricultural establishments, and others would come within the exception?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct. A solid waste disposal facility which serves a city, county, or any other governmental unit and which collects waste from the general public would come within the exception. The example you gave of collecting from individuals and all types of business and municipal establishments constitutes the general public. Facilities which serve a single private user or a group of users, such as a facility which serves a single industrial park or other similar area, would not qualify.

Mr. ROTH. Does it make any difference whether Government employees or private companies are employed to collect the waste?

Mr. DOLE. No; it does not so long as the Government employees or private companies collect waste from the general public. Nor does it make any difference whether the governmental unit or a private company actually runs or operates the facility.

Mr. ROTH. May the facility dispose of waste from the residents of more than one governmental unit?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; the facility need not be limited to serving residents of a single governmental unit. For instance, waste could be collected from the general public outside the governmental unit.

Mr. ROTH. Would a facility which receives waste from a large manufacturing plant qualify?

Mr. DOLE. Such a facility would qualify if substantially all of the solid waste processed is collected from the general public. By that, we generally mean at least 90 percent of the total waste. Therefore, whether such a facility would qualify depends upon whether the single plant contributes more than 10 percent of the waste processed and whether the other 90 percent is solid waste from the general public.

Mr. ROTH. My last question is whether a facility qualifies if it does not collect and process some waste, or if it only collects and processes wastes from a part of a city or other governmental unit?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; so long as the facility meets the requirement of serving the general public. The solid waste facility would not have to accept solid waste from every area of the governmental unit, nor would it have to accept every type of solid waste. However, a facility which only collects and processes one particular type of industrial waste, such as hazardous chemicals, would not be eligible.●

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am voting against this bill because it continues a pattern of unfairness begun with last year's tax act. We cannot balance the mistakes of last year's unfair spending cuts and tax reductions—that have proved unwise and unproductive—on the backs of America's poor and elderly.

On the spending side of this year's bill, I supported Senator BAUCUS' amendment to strike the provisions in the Finance Committee bill that first, require copayment for home health care; second, index medicare part B deductible to the Consumer Price Index; and third, set medicare part B deductible at 25 percent of program cost. These three provisions do nothing more than reduce current benefits, increase out-of-pocket health expenditures for the elderly, and impede access to services in the case of home health care.

This bill is not an effort at cost containment. It is not a reasonable response to the financial and medical constraints facing our Nation's elderly. It ignores the real causes of inflation in the health care industry and forces the elderly, already financing 43 percent of their medical expenses out of their own pockets, to pay even more.

We should be considering ways to improve the delivery and availability of essential health services rather than cutting the medicare program and shifting rising medical costs to elderly Americans. The elderly pay more than 19 percent of their income for health care costs. The elderly get sick more frequently than the rest of our population and incur costs three times greater on average than that incurred by most citizens. Medicare beneficiaries simply cannot tolerate further increases in their out-of-pocket expenses or further reductions in their medicare coverage.

The medicare amendment adopted by the Senator is less objectionable than the Finance Committee bill. However, it means the elderly will still pay approximately $1 billion from their pockets—money they cannot afford.

The tax side of the bill does not compensate for the inequity of the spending reductions in H.R. 4961. While the Finance Committee bill moves in the right direction in tightening a variety of tax loopholes opened during the 1981 Tax Act, the final bill still allows the wealthiest taxpayers an inequitable share of the tax breaks.

89-059 O-86-23 (Pt.13)

For example, the Armstrong amendment to index capital gains taxes allows higher income taxpayers an even larger tax break on capital assets—assets on which they currently pay only 20 percent. In times of severe fiscal budget deficits, America cannot afford unproductive and unjust tax loopholes.

I supported amendments by Senator BRADLEY and Senator MITCHELL to reapportion the third year tax cut to benefit lower and middleincome taxpayers. In 1981, families earning less than $50,000 paid two-thirds of the income tax in this country. These same people received only one-third of this year's tax cut. The failure of these initiatives to equalize the tax burden in America across income groups are indicative of a dangerous precedent on tax and spending measures that has come to characterize a Republican-dominated Senate.

We must stop cutting funds for the Nation's needy while simultaneously legislating unproductive tax breaks to the country's wealthy citizens. Our needy citizens cannot afford the deterioration in lifestyles these spending cuts impose. Our middle-class residents will no longer bear the inequity of a tax system that takes their money and returns tax cuts to the wealthy. And all Americans suffer from tax cuts that cause crippling high interest rates without real economic gain. In the interest of halting a dangerous, inequitable pattern in fiscal action, I oppose the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.●

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, no politician likes to raise taxes; we like to reduce them. And we have been spoiled in recent years by having regular opportunities to "cut" taxes to offset inflation-induced tax increases. Last year we enacted the largest tax cut in history.

Unfortunately, we went too far. Our focus was correct; that is, tax changes intended to spur savings and investment and to reduce the effect of "bracket creep" on individuals, but we went too far in terms of lost revenues.

Had the economy not plunged into recession, perhaps last year's bill would have provided the needed tonic for economic recovery.

We believe that last year's tax program will work. But so far it has not.

We face staggering deficits in the next few years. These deficits are the product and bad habits developed in recent years—principally the habit of spending more for worthy purposes than we can afford. We increased spending on social programs at the expense of our defense capabilities, and inadvertently created some areas of vulunerability which must be corrected. And we ran into a recession—an economic status which adds to spending needs; for example, unemployment benefits, food stamps, welfare benefits, et cetera, while reducing tax revenues. The result is intolerably high deficits which feed inflation expectations for the future. Those expectations in turn put intolerable pressure on interest rates. High interest rates stop investment cold. It is all a vicious cycle which we simply have to break.

I agree with the general thrust of the President's strategy on how to break the cycle. We must reduce the deficit and do all that we can to encourage economic growth through increased savings and investment.

We made important progress in both areas last year. This bill is the next step in that process. It would reduce spending by $17.5 billion over 3 years and increase revenues by $99 billion during that period. In other words, this bill alone will reduce the deficit by about $116 billion over the next 3 years.

We can send no stronger signal to the American people, to the financial community, and to foreign governments regarding our resolve in getting our economic house in order.

I think we can be particularly proud of the revenue-raising provisions in this bill. The pride results from the fact that this was a highly unpleasant task, one which most people thought we could not do, and one in which most of our Democratic colleagues hoped we would fail. We did not. We faced a tremendous challenge—in an election year no less—and we met it. The result helps restore my faith in the Senate, and I was proud to play a part in this process.

I must also say that I could not have higher praise for my colleague from Kansas, the chairman of the Finance Committee, who demonstrated unparalleled leadership and courage in putting this bill together.

The product of our labors will raise nearly $100 billion in tax revenues that would not otherwise have been received. More to the point, it would do so in a way that preserves the essence of the capital formation changes made last year. The focus of this bill is tax equity and tax compliance. This bill is tax reform.

Last year we cut taxes. This year we propose to reform the tax system to assure that everyone pays a fair share of taxes, that we reduce incentives for unproductive tax shelters, that we increase compliance with current law, and that we modify undesirable tax preferences.

This was not a free lunch. Reasonable people disagree on what constitutes a tax preference. And there is no denying that this bill will inflict more than $100 billion worth of pain. But our options were limited, and I believe we followed the right course.

I hope the House will see its way clear to follow a similar course.●

INSURANCE COMPANY TAX PROVISIONS IN H.R. 4961

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, earlier this year I was pleased to take the lead with Senator BENTSEN in cosponsoring legislation to correct some abuses as well as inequities in the current tax laws affecting life insurance companies. I particularly want to thank the 39 other Senators who joined us in sponsoring this bill, including a majority of the Finance Committee members.

When S. 2353 was originally offered, I noted that it was a 2-year stopgap measure, one that balances the need to increase tax revenues with the need to make some short-term corrections in the Internal Revenue Code. Leaders in the life insurance business and many Members of the Congress had pledged to forge ahead next with a more comprehensive reform to insure that the industry is paying its fair share of taxes.

The rules enacted over two decades ago to tax the income of life insurance companies are simply not working properly or fairly in today's economic environment. The special tax formula adopted in 1959 was developed at a time of low inflation—less that 1 percent. Furthermore, the life insurance business' share of total corporate taxes almost doubled from 1959 to 1978, even though the industry's income increased at a lower rate than the income of corporations generally. This increase in life insurance taxes under existing law is harmful to policyholders as well as life insurance companies.

The Bentsen-Chafee bill and many of the provisions incorporated in this tax bill—H.R. 4961—represent a constructive step in the right direction on the highly complex issue of the taxation of life insurance companies. However, much additional work needs to be done, particularly as—with the exception of the repeal of ModCo—the temporary provisions of H.R. 4961 expire in just 2½ years. Accordingly, I am hopeful that the administration will take the necessary initiatives to begin working with the Congress and the life insurance business to develop a final, comprehensive overhaul of the 1959 Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act to make sure a proper and fair balance is reached.●

THE IMPACT OF A BASIS ADJUSTMENT ON HISTORIC PRESERVATION

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I support the provision in H.R. 4961 requiring an adjustment to the basis for depreciation equal to one-half the investment tax credit.

There is justifiable concern that the incentive to perform certified historic restorations rather than nonhistoric rehabilitations will be reduced when the 50-percent basis adjustment is applied. The fine tuning we made last year in the rehabilitation tax credit provisions that increased the value of the credit for historic preservation will be lost.

As my colleagues will recall, the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 provided a 25-percent investment tax credit for certified historic rehabilitation projects. We also adopted a 20-percent investment credit for rehabilitations of buildings over 40 years old, and a 15-percent credit for structures over 30 years old. For the 15 and 20-percent categories, however, we required a full basis adjustment in order to create a wider margin between them and the 25-percent category, reflecting the higher costs of doing historic rehabilitations.

Under H.R. 4961, a basis adjustment will also be required for property eligible for the 25-percent credit. Experts in historic preservation believe that this change will make it relatively more attractive to do nonhistoric restorations of valuable and irreplaceable historic properties because such restorations are less expensive, and the difference in tax benefits is not that great.

While I do not propose an amendment to correct the problem at this time, I think it raises a serious enough concern to warrant thorough review by the Finance and Ways and Means Committees of the rehabilitation tax credit provisions in the Tax Code. It would be a tragedy to find our Nation's historic treasures being irreparably damaged by improper commercial renovations simply because of an imbalance in tax incentives.

There are a number of ways to remedy this imbalance, and I will be working with my Senate colleagues and the historic preservation community to find the best solution.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the two amendments concerning medicare which were earlier offered by my colleagues from Montana and Minnesota.

During consideration of the budget resolution earlier this year, I expressed my concern about the effect which a reconciliation instruction for large savings in medicare and medicaid might have on beneficiaries. The Budget Committee originally contemplated making over $25 billion in cuts in medicare and medicaid over the next 3 years. Due to the efforts of Senator DURENBERGER, myself, and others, that figure was reduced substantially, and it was hoped that when the Senate met in conference with the House, the figure would be reduced even further. Somewhat unexpectedly, the House approved a level of cuts which was nearly that approved by the Senate. Consequently, what emerged from the conference was a requirement that medicare and medicaid expenditures be reduced by nearly $14 billion over the next 3 years.

I believe that the Finance Committee made a good faith effort to find that level of savings through a variety of measures aimed primarily at providers. Nonetheless, the committee was still constrained to include at least three provisions which were the subject of the amendments by Senators BAUCUS and DURENBERGER and which have a direct effect on beneficiaries. In so doing, the committee saw fit to report out a bill which would have saved approximately $1.7 billion more in medicare and medicaid than was required by the budget resolution.

While I believe that it is necessary that we control Federal spending in order to reduce the Federal deficit and bring down interest rates, I do not feel that we should place undue burdens on beneficiaries—particularly when we are not compelled to do so. Therefore, I opposed the medicare and medicaid package which was considered in the Finance Committee. And for this reason, I supported the efforts by my colleague from Montana to eliminate provisions which would have a direct impact on the out-of-pocket expenses of beneficiaries.

In most instances, beneficiaries already pay deductibles, copayments, medigap premiums, medicare premiums, and bills for uncovered or partially covered services. Elderly people require more medical attention than others in our society and often are least able to afford it. That is why we have a medicare program, and why we should work to contain the amount of money which beneficiaries must pay out of their pockets for health care.

Given the failure of Senator BAUCUS' amendment to carry, I was heartened that Senator DURENBERGER was able to offer a compromise amendment which reduced the burdens on medicare recipients, I am particularly pleased that the provision requiring that the part B deductible be tied to the Consumer Price Index was struck and replaced with a less onerous provision. With respect to the home health copayment provision, and the "sunsetting" of the part B premium provision, I commend my colleague for working to limit the increase in out of pocket expenses for the elderly.

In accepting this amendment, my colleagues from Minnesota and Kansas agree to a modification of the amendment, as suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. Though discussion on this modification was brief, it is extremely significant. My good colleagues deserve praise for their sensitivity to two issues which are easily overlooked, namely the assignment rate under medicare, and the extent to which doctors pass along to beneficiaries costs for which those providers are not reimbursed.

Like my colleague from Massachusetts, I am concerned about the fact that doctors can and do pass along to beneficiaries fees which they are not able to collect from the Federal Government. A refusal to accept medicare's "reasonable rate," together with the patient's 20-percent coinsurance as payment in full allows a doctor to seek from the beneficiary additional fees. Roughly half of all medicare claims are processed on that basis; in other words, beneficiaries are liable for fees over and above the 20 percent in half of all cases.

I believe that doctors in this country owe a special obligation to the poor and to the elderly. I am mindful of the fact that medicare and medicaid have not always reimbursed doctors at a level which they perceive to be fair. However, I know of no case in which a doctor has been driven out of business or into poverty as a result of having to accept what medicare and medicaid determine to be reasonable reimbursement levels. On the other hand, many have received a handsome living from participation in these programs. Perhaps the levels of reimbursement have been lower than what doctors would ordinarily charge their patients. Yet, I believe that doctors normal charges are, in many cases, sufficiently high so that the actual fees as paid by the Government, are not grossly unjust. There is no doubt about the fact that doctors have performed vital services for Americans; many have given of their time and expertise with utterly selfless devotion. At the same time, doctors have, for the most part, been rewarded with generous salaries and opportunities for leading very comfortable lives. Moreover, a large number of doctors received substantial Federal assistance in the financing of their educations. I believe that doctors ought to remember this assistance and the contribution that nearly all Americans have made toward allowing them to enjoy the best that society offers as they consider their commitment to the elderly.

In this light, I commend my colleague from Massachusetts for his suggestion that we look into the possibility of mandating assignment under medicare. Certainly we need to explore whether the provisions of this bill which affect doctors will have an indirect effect on the out-of-pocket expenses of beneficiaries, I look forward to the Department of Health and Human Services and the Finance Committee taking prompt action in exploring this issue. Moreover, we need to look further at the ramifications of mandatory assignment. In my State, the assignment rate has traditionally been very high. However, other States suffer from very low rates. I also look forward to examining the ways in which we can improve those rates. I hope that discussion of this issue among doctors, the elderly, researchers and policymakers will be stimulated by the actions taken on this bill, and that all parties will reexamine the issue of responsibility for accepting the burden of paying for the health care needs of the Nation's elderly.●

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I think that Senator DOLE did an amazing job in reporting out this legislation; it is complex, it is controversial and, in many important areas, it is correct in its analysis of where needed revenue can be raised. But I have concluded that while this is a bill which I admire in many respects, I cannot support it.

First, I believe that partisan rather than economic concerns have insulated the Kemp-Roth 25-percent tax cut from realistic reassessment. The equitable alterations in the third year of that tax cut proposed by Senator BRADLEY clearly deserved the support of the Senate. Only political considerations prevented adoption of this modification of the President's approach. The country would have been better served, in terms of basic equity, if the Bradley proposal had been adopted. We would have avoided the need to resort to regressive excise taxes, and we could have minimized the unfair treatment of the middle- and lower-income groups which has characterized the overall Reagan program.

Second, I disagree with the provision of the committee bill to increase from 3 to 7 percent of adjusted gross income the floor above which medical expenses are deductible. I supported the amendment to strike this provision from the bill. The committee's action will deprive millions of Americans who have incurred substantial medical expenses of this legitimate recognition by the Tax Code of the effective reduction in their income and in their ability to pay taxes.

Third, I was disturbed by the increase in the Federal unemployment tax—FUTA tax. I do not believe that this is the time to increase the tax on employers per employee which may discourage the new hirings which are essential if we are to get out of this current recession. I wish the amendment by Senator METZENBAUM to link this increase with the creation of a Federal supplemental benefits program, which would have provided an additional 13 weeks of unemployment benefits for States which are experiencing high rates of unemployment, had succeeded. I will continue to work for the creation of such a program.

So I could not have supported the tax portion of this bill without qualification. But on balance I could have supported it. However, this bill was much more than a tax bill.

In the medicare and medicaid areas that the bill contains the most objectionable elements. Although the Durenberger amendment reduced the level of the cuts for medicare by $1 billion over 3 years, over $12 billion in cuts remain. Last year's reconciliation spending cut bill made significant cuts in medicare. Now we are asked to take a second swipe at some of the most vulnerable members of our society. I cannot support this. The requirement of copayment by a medicare recipient after a certain number of home health care visits reduces the probable use of this service—a service which not only has saved the Federal Government by avoiding expensive hospital care, but which has also made it possible for families to meet their medical needs in ways that minimize the social disruption associated with illness. Other changes, including the medicare reimbursement to hospitals, the delay in the initial eligibility for medicare coverage, and the changes in in-patient radiological and pathological services all constitute unacceptable changes in the ways needed medical services are provided and paid for. As for medicaid, the bill contains a repeal of the current prohibition against nominal copayments for mandatory services to categorically eligible medicaid recipients except in certain circumstances. Again, many of these people are the same people who were asked to endure the Reagan program cuts last year. Once was too much; twice is intolerable.

Finally, Mr. President, I must also object to this bill because of the way in which it has misused the reconciliation process in particular and the budget process in general. The clash on airport development was an example of this abuse, but the bill is repleat with other illustrations of inappropriate legislative activity. I am concerned about the implications that passage of this bill would have on the integrity of the legislative process in the Senate. My vote against this bill is designed, in part, to protest this attack on the legislative process.

I am pleased that the bill allows safe harbor leasing to continue in some form. If safe harbor leasing had been repealed entirely, it would have frustrated the basic goal of last year's business tax reduction by saying that those firms which are most in need of incentives for capital investment would have been unable to take any advantage whatsoever of those incentives. Leasing is vital to the automotive industry's attempt to modernize and compete with foreign producers. It is essential if we are to save jobs and create new jobs in my home State of Michigan and throughout the country.

However, in some instances the committee bill may have gone beyond what was necessary to tighten upon the leasing rules in order to avoid their abuse. I hope that the committee is open to reviewing these matters during the conference with the House in order to assure that the essential elements of leasing are preserved.

I was also pleased that the Senate adopted my amendment dealing with the provision of the bill on withholding of interest and dividends. My amendment will give financial institutions of various sizes the opportunity to show the Secretary of the Treasury that the application of the rules on withholding should be delayed because they could not immediately comply with the new regulations without encountering an undue burden. With this amendment added to the bill's withholding provision, I felt that I was able to support this provision of the bill. In its amended form, the bill will improve the rate of compliance with taxes owed on interest and dividend income, and at the same time avoid having financial institutions which can show an undue burden from having to deal with the withholding requirement on top of all their other current financial problems.

Mr. President, I recognize the need to raise additional revenues and restrain Federal spending in an effort to reduce the deficit. This bill accomplishes those purposes, and in many ways it achieves them in an acceptable fashion. I commend Senator DOLE on his political courage and skill in bringing such a controversial bill out of committee and to the floor. But I cannot support several of its key components. I do not share its philosophic reluctance to modify the basic 3-year tax plan, and I cannot accept the burden it places on our senior citizens and middle- and low-income taxpayers. Accordingly, I will vote against this bill.●

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, a New York Times editorial characterized the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 as a "surprisingly constructive piece of legislation," which, "would go a long way toward making the tax laws more equitable."

A Washington Post editorial stated that the Senate Finance Committee, in constructing the new tax bill, "has taken large steps toward making the Tax Code simplier and fairer." The editorial ended by declaring that the Finance Committee "needs—and deserves—the full support of the administration, the Congress and the public."

A Boston Globe editorial predicts that "if all or most of the tax package gets through the House and the Senate unscathed, the entire Nation will gain."

And finally, the Los Angeles Times titled their editorial on the tax bill as "A Piece of Art."

Mr. President, the above statements are part of one of the most widely acclaimed endorsements of a major piece of tax legislation in several years. They are a tribute to, and a reaffirmation of, a measure that will aid this country in its efforts to reduce the size and scope of the Federal deficit.

I am aware of the fact that the road to final consideration of this measure has been an arduous one. But, I am most pleased that we are about to approve this measure, and I would like to take this opportunity to thank Finance Committee Chairman DOLE, ranking member Senator LONG, and the rest of the Finance Committee and staff for their tireless efforts and dedicated work on behalf of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, what committee amendment did we just support?

FIRST COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have not yet announced the result.

The question is on the first committee amendment containing parts 1 through 3, as amended.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the second committee amendment be eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the second committee amendment is title IV, is it not?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is the title that violates rule XV, paragraph 5. It would fall on a point of order.

Mr. President, is it proper to ask the Chair if that would have fallen on a point of order because it violates rule XV, paragraph 5?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would fall.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

The Senator now wishes to ask unanimous consent to delete it?

Mr. DOLE. I do.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to retain that part of the amendment striking the House language?

Mr. DOLE. Would the Chair repeat the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to retain that part of the amendment which strikes the House language?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is now on agreeing to the remaining committee amendments.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a single amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Well, consider it in en bloc.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question first is on the amendment.

The first committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) would each vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii, (Mr. INOUYE) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 47, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 4961), as amended, was passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "An Act to provide for tax equity and fiscal responsibility, and for other purposes.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 200 copies of H.R. 4961 as passed be printed for use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make any necessary technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of the Senate amendments to H.R. 4961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have just enacted here in the Senate one of the most complex pieces of tax legislation that has come before this body since I have been here in 28 years.

The able chairman of the Finance Committee handled this matter in a most exemplary manner. I wish to commend him and the able Senator from Louisiana as managers of this bill, and I wish to say that I have never seen more expertise shown in handling a piece of legislation than was shown in the handling of this particular measure by the chairman of the Finance Committee, the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

He is to be highly commended, and I think we are all in his debt.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to say one word.

I thank all Members of the Senate because we have had good debate. We have been able, I think, to accommodate many Senators on each side even though they could not vote for the bill on final passage. I think we have had a good working relationship and we will continue that relationship.

I also pay special thanks to the Finance Committee staff on both sides and the joint committee staff for their tireless efforts. They have been working on this for a matter of 5 or 6 months and, while we have been working part of that time, the joint committee staff, the Finance Committee staff on both sides, and all the legislative assistants of different Senators have been working on this bill pretty much full time for a long time, and we certainly thank them and the Senate legislative counsel for their untiring efforts.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas for the truly magnificient performance that he achieved here in the Chamber in managing this bill.

The Senator was in good humor. He was extremely effective. He prevailed on almost every amendment and at almost every turn. As a matter of fact, I thought he was going to prevail on every amendment, and he did, until some time after 3:30 a.m. this morning.

His performance I think is in the very best traditions of the Senate, and I join with all other Senators in wishing him what will surely be a memorable birthday.

Mr. DOLE. That was yesterday.

Mr. LONG. I think his management of the bill was truly exceptional.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my colleague for his help during the consideration of this bill and particularly in the Chamber the past several days.

I think we have worked well together and I appreciate it very much.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to express my gratitude to the distinguished Senator from Kansas and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana for their tireless effort to assist in working the will of the Senate.

It was a difficult and complex piece of legislation. The Senate committed 34 hours and 45 minutes of its time to the debate of this measure. There were 29 rollcall votes, 20 of them during this day of session: We agreed to 48 of those amendments, we rejected 14, 3 were withdrawn, and 2 were ruled nongermane.

Mr. President, that is a prodigious legislative job and I cannot overstate my admiration for the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Louisiana, and all other Members who participated so actively in this matter.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I join with those of us who have expressed commendations concerning the performance of the very able Senator from Kansas. He has demonstrated a skill, presence of mind, an overall knowledge of the subject matter of the legislation that excites the admiration of all Senators.

I voted against the bill, but nonetheless I compliment him and I salute him for the competence that he has shown and for the fairness that he has shown and for his constant good humor and inimicable wit which keeps us all in good spirits at least most of the time.

Mr. President, I wish to express my admiration to the manager of the bill on my own side of the aisle. Mr. LONG is recognized by all, of course, as a very competent and able legislator, and one who has a thorough knowledge of the subject matter of the tax measures to come before the Senate.

We on this side of the aisle certainly, and I think the Senate, have benefited by his guidance on this particular piece of legislation, and I personally want to thank him on behalf of myself and on behalf of the Senate for the work he has done in conjunction with this bill.

He, too, voted against it. But, nevertheless, he has contributed a great deal in the deliberations on this measure.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT MANDATING A BALANCED BUDGET

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I speak this morning in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 58, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution to require a balanced Federal budget and to limit Congress taxing and spending powers. Sixty-two of my colleagues have cosponsored this resolution, so there is little uncertainty as to the outcome of the vote.

In my opinion, a constitutional amendment to balance the budget is a poor solution to our current budgetary problems. It is unworkable, counterproductive, and has all the potential for being most harmful to our economy. Nevertheless, the current administration—which has brought and will continue to bring us a string of budget deficits higher than any in American history—seems to believe that an amendment to the Constitution will make those deficits go away. Recent action by the Finance Committee to raise taxes for the next 3 years still leaves us with a deficit of at least $100 billion for fiscal year 1983—following on the heels of a $115 billion plus deficit for fiscal year 1982. Were the constitutional amendment to have force of law today, how and where would the budget be brought into balance, and more importantly, what impact would that effort have on our economy?

As Santayana said, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Between the Civil War and World War II, there were six financial crashes and two long depressions that sent this country into economic and political turmoil. Throughout it all, Congresses and Presidents struggled conscientiously to balance the budget and to pay off the war debts. In fact, until the 1930's our economic policy—ardently supported by Democrats and Republicans alike—was based on the premise that the budget must be balanced at any cost.

THE PANIC OF 1873

The United States had paid off its Federal debt in the 1830's, but it had had to borrow heavily to finance the Civil War. However, after the war, the budget was consistently in surplus and, once again, the national debt was slowly reduced. The social costs to the country were tremendous. Banks, then as now, used Government bonds as reserves. As the debt was retired the money supply became tighter. The situation was exacerbated when Congress put the country back on the gold standard. The resulting collapse of private credit caused the first of the great American financial panics in 1873, which threw the country into a depression that lasted 5 years; 20 years later, the country found itself in a similar panic, leading again to a depression and an unemployment rate that soared to nearly 20 percent as the century came to a close.

THE CRASH OF 1929 AND THE GREAT DEPRESSION

When the Depression began in 1929, Federal budget policy was firmly anchored to the idea that the budget should be balanced annually. The 1920's had been a decade of surpluses; debt incurred during World War I had been sharply reduced.

The 1931 budget was submitted by President Hoover on December 2, 1929; at that time surpluses were estimated for 1930 and 1931. At no time during the calendar year 1930 was there a direct admission that large deficits might soon be incurred. In fact, at first both the President and Secretary Mellon believed that the stock market crash in 1929 affected speculators mainly and left American business sound. The 1932 budget, released in December 1930, also indicated surpluses for the fiscal years 1931 and 1932. What actually happened is shown by the table below.

ESTIMATED AND ACTUAL BUDGET SURPLUSES AND DEFICITS, FISCAL YEARS 1930–33

[In millions of dollars]

	Initial budget estimate	Revised budget estimate	Actual surplus or deficit
Fiscal year:
1930	+614	+856	+738
1931	+758	+262	−462
1932	+499	−1,711	−2,735
1933	−923	−1,146	−2,602

As the Depression deepened, it became apparent that the budget projections had been far too optimistic and that the Treasury would be faced with larger deficits than any previously incurred in peacetime. The first quarter of 1931 was the first quarterly period to show a deficit.

Consequently, President Hoover worked for an early return to a balanced budget as the dominant goal of his economic policy. Deficits announced for 1931 and 1932 were of unprecedented magnitude for peacetime standards. Hoover refused to consider borrowing because it interfered with "recovery of employment by detouring capital away from industry and commerce into the Treasury of the United States." Instead, he recommended a 2-year tax increase.

In early 1932, Hoover called a balanced budget "the very keystone of recovery" and predicted that an unbalanced budget would prolong the depression indefinitely. This view was accepted by the Democrats as well as Republicans. When the 1932 tax bill was under consideration, Jouett Shouse, chairman of the Democratic National Executive Committee urged party Members in Congress to support a nonpartisan plan to balance the budget.

The drive for a balanced budget gained momentum during the spring of 1932. In the President's opinion, congressional action on the tax bill and economy measures was being delayed unnecessarily. "Nothing," he said, "is more necessary at this time than balancing the budget." When the end of May arrived without further congressional action, the President personally went to the Senate which then passed the tax bill that same day. Yet, even this was not enough to achieve a balanced budget as the economy continued to deteriorate.

While the insistence on a balanced budget in the face of such economic circumstances might seem unusual today, it should be remembered that a balanced budget in the 1929-33 timeframe was considered necessary—indeed, essential—"not merely for maintaining unimpaired the credit of the Government, but also for reinvigorating the entire credit structure of the country" as Secretary of the Treasury Mellon stated. In making a balanced budget the primary policy goal, the President, officials of the executive branch, and the leadership of both parties in Congress were acting in accordance with the traditional principle of a balanced budget in peacetime.

A balanced budget was also an issue in the 1932 election. In a major economic address delivered in Pittsburgh, Franklin D. Roosevelt indicted the Hoover administration for delayed action and lack of courage in balancing the budget. During the campaign, the Democrats continued to charge that the party in control had "recklessly" neglected to maintain control of the country's finances.

The last budget submitted by the Hoover administration—the 1934 budget, which was submitted after the election—confirmed the fact that there would be a budget deficit. In order to balance the budget, President Hoover once again recommended tax increases and "drastic reductions in expenditures." Shortly thereafter, Franklin Roosevelt became President.

Many economic historians, with the benefit of 20-20 hindsight, of course, argue that as Hoover and Mellon continued their fervent quest for a balanced budget in a rapidly deteriorating economy, they exacerbated the downward economic slide. (On this general subject matter see: "Economic Instability and Growth," (Harper & Row), by Robert Gordon, Chapter 3, "The Great Depression;" Financial History of the United States, (McGraw Hill), by Studenski and Kross, Chapter 27, "The Gloomy Years;" Federal Budget and Fiscal Policy 1789-1958, (The Brookings Institute), by Lewis Kimmel, Chapter IV, "The Hoover Years: Conflicting Views.")

JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES

Clearly, conventional economic wisdom was not working and new thoughts began to stir. In England, John Maynard Keynes published a book in 1936 entitled "The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money" which revolutionized economic thinking. According to Keynes, the Federal budget should be employed as the balance wheel of the economy. Instead of a balanced budget at any cost, budget deficits and the national debt were wisely employed by Republican and Democratic administrations alike to stimulate the national economy when necessary, beginning with the administration of Franklin Roosevelt.

The other side of Keynesian theory, of course, was that in conditions of full employment and an expanding economy, it was essential to run a surplus budget to avoid inflation. I would be the first to concede that that part of Keynes too often has been ignored and we have paid a price for it as, for example, when Lyndon Johnson decided to fight the Vietnam war without seeking a tax increase. The resulting deficit during the robust economy of the time kindled inflationary pressures which we are still feeling today.

The central point of Keynesian theory, Mr. President, is that neither a deficit budget nor a balanced budget are good or bad in themselves. Everything depends on the economic situation we are in. At times a deficit budget to stimulate the economy is the only policy that makes sense. At other times a balanced budget is the only sound policy to pursue.

The central point, Mr. President, is that we should not permanently and perpetually worship at either altar. A budget is not some article of religious faith. It is a practical tool for trying to manage an intricate economy when things slip out of gear. Like any other tool, it has to be used with reason and it has to be appropriate to the problem we are trying to solve.

That flexibility is precisely what this amendment would take away. It seeks to bind us permanently and perpetually to a budgetary creed regardless of the economic situation we face. It converts what should be a means to an end into an end in itself and it could lead us to economic disaster.

CONCLUSION

Today it seems that we are forgetting the lessons of the past. America, generally speaking, has been prosperous for so long that our prosperity is now taken for granted. People do not know or do not remember the painful costs exacted from our country when a balanced budget was mandated, not by force of the Constitution, but by force of the dogma of conventional wisdom. They do not remember that in past chapters of our history we clung to the goal of a balanced budget even if it brought about economic hardship and strain.

F. Scott Fitzgerald once said that the "test of a first-rate intelligence is the ability to hold two opposed ideas in the mind at the same time." Perhaps that would explain the recent tolerance of the Reagan administration for huge budget deficits while supporting an amendment to the Constitution to make them go away. Fitzgerald and I disagree in this case. Budget arithmetic has no place in a Constitution that is devoted to the rights and obligations of the American people. Budgets are bound to economic circumstances that shift with the wind and have no regard at all for absolute laws. That fact should be all too clear to an administration which, in the space of 1 year, has been forced to alter its carefully charted course as economic events have undermined its goals.

Several months ago, in an article in the Chicago Tribune, columnist Stephen Chapman wrote:

> Apart from providing for the operation of the government, the Constitution is supposed to put certain fundamental issues beyond the reach of public opinion. That is why we have a Bill of Rights: to guarantee that the majority does not use democratic means to repeal the rights of minorities.
>
> It takes an inventive mind to argue that the collective populace has an inalienable right to have no more than 20.3 percent of its income taken in taxes. . . .
> The answer is that Americans don't want to make the sacrifice required to balance the budget and constrain federal spending. The day Americans summon the will to demand austerity, Congress will provide it. No constitutional amendment can substitute for that will.

Mr. President, there are two dangers associated with this amendment to the Constitution. One is the danger that the amendment would not be enforced; the second is the danger that it ritualistically will be. Put another way, this amendment will be either the great American "con job" or the great American economic "strangler." Either result makes it unworthy of constitutional sanctification.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a series of newspaper columns and editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, June 2, 1981]

BALANCED BUDGET PROPOSAL SIMPLY WOULDN'T WORK

(James J. Kilpatrick)

The road to hell, so the maxim reminds us, is paved with good intentions. The Senate Judiciary Committee has taken off down that road in a cloud of commendable motives.

The committee has proposed a constitutional amendment to compel adoption of balanced federal budgets. The proposal is preposterous.

The committee's intention, to repeat, is altogether sound. If there is a prime cause of the inflation that afflicts our economy, it lies in the inability of successive Congresses to control federal spending. Only twice in the past 50 years has Congress achieved a small surplus. The accumulating deficits now approach one trillion dollars. Money pours out of the Treasury at the rate of two billion dollars a day, or $22,000 a second.

Almost no one questions the desirability, as a general proposition of balanced budgets. John Randolph of Roanoke long ago proclaimed what he termed "the philosopher's stone" of sound fiscal management: "It is pay as you go, sir! Pay as you go!" But no parliamentary masters ever have devised a mechanism for making Randolph's rule enforceable.

The Senate committee's pending effort follows in this futile tradition. Section One of the proposed amendment directs Congress prior to each fiscal year to adopt "a statement of receipts and outlays for that year in which total outlays are no greater than total receipts." Any schoolboy with a tally stick could run up such a statement in a moment. All that is required is that one conjure up a list of revenues, $700 billion; and in a parallel column a list of outlays, $700 billion. So much for the statement.

A WAIVER, OF COURSE

The proposed amendment continues by saying that "the Congress may amend such statement." Precisely so. If an invitation to dishonest budgeting were engraved by Tiffany's, it could not convey a clearer meaning. In particular exigencies, by a three-fifths vote in each house, Congress could waive the limitation.

In its second section, the amendment would command that total receipts for a given fiscal year "shall not increase by a rate greater than the rate of increase in national income in the last calendar year ending before such fiscal year." The provision is gauzier even than "privileges and immunities" or "due process of law." The "national income" is a work of statistical guesswork. The "rate of increase" in this fictional compilation is thus illusory. Whatever these conjectures might be, they would require that anticipated revenues for the fiscal year that ends Sept. 30, 1990, be linked to the "national income" in the calendar year 1988. This is nonsense.

The third section says that Congress may waive the whole idea of a balanced budget whenever a declaration of war is in effect.

A MIND-BOGGLER

Section Four boggles the mind: "The Congress may not require that the States engage in additional activities without compensation equal to the additional costs." What state activities are "additional" activities? And what does this have to do with a balanced federal budget?

A fifth section attempts to define "total receipts." A sixth section would make the amendment effective in the second fiscal year following ratification.

I do not mean to be overly critical, but a constitutional amendment without effective means of enforcement is a nullity. It carries no more weight than a resolution endorsing safe driving. Simply to declare that the budget shall be balanced is to echo Glendower's famous boast that he could summon spirits from the vasty deep. "Why, so can I," says Hotspur, "or so can any man; but will they come when you do call for them?"

Over the years I suppose I have scrutinized 50 versions of a balanced budget amendment. Politically speaking, the effective versions are not feasible, and the feasible versions are not effective. I am impelled to the conclusion that the only remedy for fiscal extravagance is to elect frugal people to the Congress. To paraphase Justice Stone's famous observation on the Supreme Court the only check upon the spending power is the members' own sense of self-restraint.

That laudable characteristic is a rare and feeble quality in Congress, but it offers a better hope than the flawed proposal now heading for the Senate floor.

[From the Washington Post, June 21, 1982]

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT (I).—FORMULA FOR A DEPRESSION

The constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget now has 60 sponsors in the Senate. That makes it very likely to be passed when it comes to the floor, perhaps this week. The immediate motive here is wretchedly trivial—to provide a little shelter for a conservative Senate as it raises the federal debt limit. Because the federal budget deficit is rising under Mr. Reagan, most of those 60 senators are feeling highly vulnerable on the subject of debt and, before lifting the limit, they want an opportunity to demonstrate their allegiance to fiscal orthodoxy. It is an absurd reason for tampering with the Constitution.

By enforcing the rule of a balanced budget, this amendment would leave no discretion whatever to a president and Congress to combat recessions. Theoretically, the amendment would allow a deficit by a three-fifths vote in each house of Congress. In reality, governments are always slow to acknowledge economic trouble ahead, and it is utterly unlikely that Congress could react sufficiently quickly or unanimously, to avert real damage. Under the iron commandment of continuous balance, a recession like the present one would quickly turn into a true depression on a scale that this country has not seen since the 1930s.

The senators who support this amendment speak for a part of America that has been prosperous so long that it takes prosperity for granted, and no longer remembers the fearful cost that a country pays for obscurantist policy. When private demand declines, as it periodically does, the process quickly becomes self-perpetuating unless it is offset by public demand—that is, deficit spending by the government. While it is currently fashionable to deride Keynesian doctrine, Mr. Keynes' answer to recession was right 45 years ago, is right today and will continue to be right in the future. One sincere testimonial to it comes from the Reagan administration, which is relying on it to end the present recession and is explicitly counting on next month's tax cut—and the larger deficits that it will cause—to pull the country back into a pattern of faster growth.

Undoubtedly it would be desirable to run the federal budget fairly close to balance over a period of years, taking the better times and the worse ones together. But to declare that the budget must necessarily balance every year, good or bad, unless the country is actually at war, is to invite the scarifying spirals of the 1930s and the 1890s. It is grotesque for senators and a president who cannot get their current deficit under $100 billion to support, piously, constitutional language putting it at zero. Conservatives in particular might note that there are only two ways to do it quickly—a tremendous reduction in Mr. Reagan's defense plans or a tremendous increase in taxes. Senators sponsoring this amendment might usefully be asked which alternative they support.

One sturdy Republican, Charles McC. Mathias of Maryland, describes this amendment correctly when he terms it the instrument of "sluggards and cowards," incapable of the hard thinking and the hard votes that orderly budgets require.

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT (II).—FORMULA FOR CHAOS

The constitutional amendment to force a balanced budget reflects several different kinds of serious errors of judgment. As we have argued previously, the insistence on a continuous balance, under all circumstances, in boom and in recession, is extremely dangerous as economic policy. A subsidiary objection, but not a trivial one, is the attempt to write an economic statistic, the national income, into the Constitution.

The national income accounts are very good statistics, but they don't belong in basic law. Congress has occasionally written statistics into statutes in recent years, and the results would not encourage sensible people to expand the practice. In one notable case, Congress pegged Social Security to the consumer price index, innocently intending to protect retired people from inflation. But the index then began rising much faster than inflation because of a peculiarity in the formula. The effect was to increase Social Security benefits a good deal faster than inflation, at the expense of people who were still working—a thing that Congress never intended. Economic indicators are complex and, in unexpected conditions, will often react in unexpected ways.

The question arises because the proposed amendment tries to prevent bracket creep—the process through which inflation raises revenues by kicking taxpayers into higher brackets. Federal revenues could not constitutionally rise faster than the previous year's national income, under this amendment, unless Congress explicitly enacted legislation permitting it. Since revenues automatically rise faster than incomes in a business boom, Congress would have to pass tax legislation in every boom year.

The Commerce Department periodically revises its national income accounts. Under the amendment, the revisions would threaten to put the government retroactively in violation of the Constitution, by lowering the figures for past years' income.

This amendment is an extreme example of the impulse to take all discretion out of economic policy, at whatever cost to rational government. Its purpose is to put the economy under an automatic pilot, guaranteed to be impervious to changing circumstance and necessity. It is an impulse hostile to the principle of democratic representation, as Congress embodies it. It attempts to substitute a computer and a number. But the economic statistics are designed only to serve people who make decisions, not to replace them.

FAKE AMENDMENT, FALSE BALANCE

President Reagan's election appeared to head off the misguided drive to amend the Constitution to require a balanced budget. He promised balance by 1984 and hardly seemed to need a gun at his head. But with that promise in ruins, the amendment drive has been revived. And Mr. Reagan himself is thought to be moving toward leading the parade. He is said to favor a version that passed the Senate Judiciary Committee last spring.

The only thing that has changed, however, is the political weather. The amendment is still a terrible idea.

In strictly economic terms, such an amendment can in fact be harmful. For in times of recession, like the present, Federal deficits are desired even by avowed conservatives. Deficits can stimulate spending and cushion the decline.

Why then require balance for all time? Only for transient political reasons.

Republicans alarmed by the projected Reagan deficits suddenly find the amendment attractive armor. It would be one way of reassuring the voters in November that the Grand Old Party has not gone berserk. The President no doubt shares that calculation: embracing the amendment might restore his reputation for fiscal conservatism even though it would not take effect until the next administration, in 1985.

But what may be clever politics is not at all good policy. The barriers against deficit spending ought to be temporal, not constitutional. A President's misguided tax policy or zealous spending, or the lack of discipline in Congress, ought to be addressed with legislation and the rules of the budgetary process.

What is more, the words with which the Senate would clutter the Constitution are really just a charade. They appear to require budget balance in every fiscal year, but a modest three-fifths of Congress could lift the restriction any time. And although the amendment speaks of holding the growth of Federal revenues to the growth rate of the economy, a simple majority of Congress could break that rule at will.

In fact, the only thing to be said for this measure is that it would ward off the clamor for a budget amendment by constitutional convention. That can be required by 34 states; 31 have now requested it and two more may join this spring. Yet the procedure has never been tried and poses unknown risks. A convention might not limit itself to budget issues, and challenges to its actions could throw government into a major legal crisis.

Some Washington officials therefore see Congressional action as the lesser of two evils. But there is a much better way to appease the public's anxiety: Move toward a balanced budget in the right way—by reducing defense spending, slowing the growth of Social Security benefits and raising taxes after the recession ends.

[From the New York Times, May 3, 1982]

LEADERS, NOT LAWS, BALANCE BUDGETS

As political camouflage, Mr. Reagan's enthusiastic endorsement of a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget made sense. The message seemed to be, forget that it was he himself who has insisted on enormous permanent tax cuts before making proportionate spending cuts. Forget that in February it was he who said that the resulting deficits "will not jeopardize the economic recovery." Forget, too, that he dismissed Senator Holling's February initiative for a freeze on most spending. That was before the prospect of a 12-digit deficit became a giant political liability.

As the means to "save our economy," the amendment is a fraud.

The version Mr. Reagan apparently wants is so riddled with escape hatches that it would have little disciplinary effect on the budget process. And if tougher language were substituted, thus creating a truly effective check on deficit spending by the Government, great economic damage might result.

The proposed amendment that has won informal White House approval was written last year by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It would require a balanced budget in each fiscal year, but would allow a three-fifth's majority in Congress to override the requirement. It would also require Congress to limit the growth of spending to the rate of growth in the economy, though a simple majority of Congress could shelve that rule.

Wouldn't Congress rather vote for those overrides than enforce balance on the backs of veterans or Social Security pensioners or farmers? Most likely it would. But creating a set of constitutional ties that really bind could lead to disaster.

In spite of what the President says, there is no sound economic logic for the Federal Government "to do what each of us does with our own family budgets—spend no more than we can afford." Government deficits can provide a cushion of purchasing power that limits the loss of output and employment recessions.

The current recession is, arguably, the worst since 1937. Unemployment nationwide is at or near record highs. If an effective balanced-budget amendment had been in effect since the recession began last year, however, it would have forced Congress to reduce spending or raise taxes by more than $100 billion. That would have wiped out millions more jobs.

Everyone agrees that the Federal Government's flexibility to spend more than it taxes is a permanent invitation to special interests to grab a piece of the action. But far more important than this drawback is the way that flexibility actually functions to cushion cycles in economic activity.

The truth is that there is no magic bullet for fiscal responsibility. To check waste in government takes high-quality leadership—something neither Mr. Reagan nor Congress is currently providing.

[From the Kansas City Times, May 1, 1982]

THE MISBEGOTTEN AMENDMENT

President Reagan, who has been quite unsuccessful at balancing the federal budget, now proposes that future presidents and Congress be forced to do so. His threatened big stick to get Congress to enact a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution is a letter-writing campaign by the American public.

The voters must see through this ploy. The administration is the biggest reason for the grass-roots movement for a balanced budget because of its failure to control deficits. Yet Mr. Reagan probably would not have to live with the results of this folly. Even if the amendment is adopted by two-thirds of Congress and then ratified by three-fourths of the states, it would be several years before it became law.

The president has been nebulous about support of an amendment until recently. He previously worried out loud that its adoption only would result in higher taxes being imposed by Congress, which would find itself with no other way to meet government services.

But a Republican-endorsed balanced budget amendment could sell well with voters back home as GOP candidates face re-election this November. We don't think the president has overlooked that point. In fact, it probably is what prompted him to get on the bandwagon.

If voters don't see through this political hat trick, Congress will be hamstrung in its deliberations over budget and tax policy. Higher taxes and a deeper recession down the road might very well be the result. And a fiscal code would be written indelibly into the U.S. Constitution. In short, the amendment amounts to extremely poor public policy.

[From the New York Times, July 16, 1982]

BALANCED BUDGET CANDY

Go ahead and vote for the balanced budget amendment. Believe me, you've got nothing to lose.

But I don't think it's a good idea to freeze restrictions on deficits and spending into the Constitution. Someday we might decide we want a deficit again, to stimulate the economy.

No problem. The amendment wouldn't actually force you to balance the budget, or even limit Federal spending. You could get out of the obligation to balance with a three-fifths majority, and it would take only a simple majority to get rid of the spending limit. In a real pinch, you can always hide spending in off-budget cookie jars, like capital accounts or loan guarantees.

What's the point, then?

The point, my friend, is what your vote will say to the folks back home. You just went along with the first $100 billion deficit in the nation's history. Your constituents may not understand economic policy but they sure don't like the idea of Government going deeper into debt every year. Why do you think the President is making such a play for the amendment? Remember all those campaign speeches about the evils of deficit spending? He's got a reputation to protect—and so do you.

Those requirements for the votes to authorize deficits and unlimited spending still bother me. I sure don't want to go on the record with votes on those issues.

No big deal. In the first place, we're talking about a constitutional amendment. It has to be ratified by 38 states, so it can't take effect for years. And there's a good chance the special interests will kill it, anyway. If it does survive, by then the panic over deficits may very well have subsided. You may not even have to feel embarrassed about voting for a deficit. But if you do, you can always say it's all in the name of Social Security or defense or whatever. The folks back home won't complain about that.

I have to agree that it looks like a cheap vote.

Cheap and sweet. This balanced budget thing is pure political candy: all benefit; no risk at all.

O.K. But there's still that other point.

What's that?

Is it really a good idea to clutter up the Constitution with a phony amendment like this? And what if it turns out to be worse than phony? What if having to take all those three-fifths and majority votes makes it impossible for Congress to function? Isn't that what we should be talking about, instead of how this lets us look better to voters upset by all the current deficit talk?

[From the New York Times, May 11, 1982]

DEFICITS AND "DEFICITS"

(By Robert L. Heilbroner)

Alarmed at the size of the mounting deficit, President Reagan has come out for a constitutional amendment to enforce a balanced Federal budget. After the amendment is ratified, the Government will be allowed to spend only what it takes in as taxes. No more borrowing, with its horrendous consequences. Financial virtue will have been restored.

I have a suggestion to make. Why not strengthen the fight against profligacy by widening the amendment to include deficits of all kinds? Specifically, why not make it unconstitutional for businesses to spend more money than they take in as their normal revenues?

There is, of course, a very good reason, small matters of constitutionality aside. It is that a prohibition on business "deficits" would bring an end to much economic expansion. When A.T.&T. wants build a satellite, it doesn't normally pay for it from the revenues generated by your telephone calls. It goes out and borrows the money for its new capital investment, or issues new stock. So does Exxon and I.B.M. and the rest of the Fortune 500.

Of course, corporate borrowing and spending isn't called a "deficit." It's called business investment. Nor are the corporate bonds or new stocks looked on as evidence of profligacy. They simply indicate that the process of capital formation has been going on, giving us productive assets that we can kick with our feet, and securities that we can put into safe-deposit boxes. As a result, when we discover that A.T.&T.'s long-term debt has gone up $32 billion in 1975 to over $50 billion today, we don't talk about profligacy, we talk about growth.

But why isn't this also true of Government? If it is productive for A.T.&T. to borrow money to loft a satellite, why isn't it all right for the Government to do the same thing? If it is growth-producing for Ford or General Motors to borrow money or issue shares to modernize their plant and equipment, why isn't growth-producing for the Government to modernize the road system so that we can drive the new models without breaking their axles? If it is praiseworthy for I.B.M. to go to the public for money to finance a new research facility, why isn't it equally praiseworthy for the Bureau of Standards or the National Institute of Mental Health to do the same thing? If it is good to build airplanes and apartment houses and steel plants on borrowed money, why is it bad to borrow money to build public transportation or public housing or public waste-reclamation plants?

But, it will be said, the capital expansion of private firms generates additional sales for them, out of which they will be able to pay the interest on their additional debt. True. And isn't it also true that the capital investment of the public sector generates additional gross national product out of which more tax revenues will arise to finance the added interest on the public debt?

Thus the balanced-budget amendment may save us from profligacy, but it may also force us into poverty, exactly as if the amendment applied to the private sector. For the Government sector, like the private sector, builds for the future, as well as using up wealth in the present. When we spend our public income for arms or postal services, we are consuming our wealth, as we do when we spend our private incomes for sporting rifles or telegrams. To give the budget-balancers their due, perhaps we should limit our public consumption expenditures to the normal flow of tax incomes that the public sector enjoys. But when we spend money for harbors or dams, or for aid to P.S. 162, we are increasing our future capacity to produce, just as surely as when we spend it on machine tools or an Ivy League education. There is absolutely nothing to be said for limiting investment spending, which is growth-producing, to our normal incomes, whether these incomes are derived from sales or taxes.

Looking at the functions of Government as investment or consumption does not tell us whether or not the Government is making wise political or social decisions. It does not even give us a guide as to whether the Government is making intelligent economic decisions. It is possible to make very bad investment choices and very wasteful consumption expenditures. Washington has plenty of examples of both to show for its money. So do Pittsburgh, Detroit, and Middletown, U.S.A.

Nevertheless, breaking down the Government budget into investment and consumption does not help remove what I consider to be the single most serious impediment to the effective use of our economic potential. This is the tendency to think of all Government spending as essentially consumption, and usually wasteful consumption at that. Before we fasten ourselves into a balanced-budget straitjacket, we should remember that American economic growth depends just as crucially on borrowing and spending for investment in the public sector as it does in the private.

OUTLAWING THE BUDGET DEFICIT

(By Stephen Chapman)

If you believe F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ronald Reagan is anything but the ignorant halfwit portrayed by his critics. Despite his large deficits, the President likes the idea of a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. Fitzgerald assured us that the "test of a first-rate intelligence is the ability to hold two opposed ideas in the mind at the same time."

Reagan's critics, however, can rally behind Ralph Waldo Emerson. Congressional Democrats have spent the last 14 months lambasting Reagan for not balancing the budget. Yet they are opposed to an amendment to require what they demand. Emerson insisted that "a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of small minds."

At the risk of revealing a small, second-rate mind, let me take my stand for consistency. As Reagan knows, deficits no more cause inflation or high interest rates or any of the other ills ascribed to them than toads cause warts. So there is no point in outlawing them, least of all by constitutional amendment.

What is important to the economy is not how much the government takes in taxes, but how much it spends. That is the sum of its claim on the nation's resources. If cutting revenues puts pressure on Congress to reduce spending, then a deficit is even beneficial.

This is more or less what Reagan has been saying for the last few months in defense of his tax cut. But last week he implicitly endorsed the balance-the-budget amendment before the Senate.

Sponsored by the National Taxpayers Union and the National Tax Limitation Committee, it requires a balanced budget every year and restricts increases in revenues to the rate of growth of the economy. The idea is to freeze Washington's share of the nation's output (now about 20.3 percent). The amendment has 53 co-sponsors.

There are other flaws besides its focus on the imaginary damage wrought by deficit financing. The first is the danger that the amendment won't be enforced. The second is the danger that it will be.

Federal budgets are not known for their pinpoint accuracy. They require estimates about hundreds of unforeseeable developments. If inflation is lower than expected, revenues will drop by billions of dollars. If interest rates rise, spending will rise too.

The amendment requires Congress, at the beginning of each fiscal year, to match expected spending and revenues. The cynical might note that Congress can do so with ease: all it has to do is choose congenial economical assumptions. If the two figures don't match at the end of the year, tough luck—the taxes have been collected and the money spent.

The only way to avoid this is to prevent Congress from adopting a fraudulent budget at the outset. If the courts rule that no citizen has the right to sue, Congress will be free to do as it pleases. Otherwise, the whole matter will have to be litigated. In the end, a judge will either approve the original budget or write his own.

Thus the judiciary will intrude into one more area historically reserved for elected legislators. Conservatives who oppose judicial activism shouldn't count this as progress.

The amendment's supporters insist that if Congress really doesn't want to balance the budget, it doesn't have to. Three-fifths of the members of both houses can vote to waive the requirement, or else a majority can declare war. But if the shackles are so flimsy, why bother to impose them at all?

One answer is that unbalancing the budget will be politically risky, discouraging Congress from doing it. Don't bet on it. To run deficits now, Congress has to vote every year to raise the debt ceiling, exposing individual members to public condemnation. Every year, after perfunctory gestures toward fiscal continence, Congress manfully braves the risk.

There is also a philosophical objection to the amendment. Reducing government spending is a wholly admirable goal. But doing so in this way misunderstands the purpose of a constitution.

Apart from providing for the operation of the government, the Constitution is supposed to put certain fundamental issues beyond the reach of public opinion. That is why we have a Bill of Rights: to guarantee that the majority does not use democratic means to repeal the rights of minorities.

It takes an inventive mind to argue that the collective populace has an inalienable right to have no more than 20.3 percent of its income taken in taxes. Nor is a minority in danger here. The sponsors say that 80 percent of Americans want a balanced budget. If so, why don't they elect representatives who will provide them?

The answer is that Americans don't want to makes the sacrifices required to balance the budget and constrain federal spending. It's easy to tell a pollster you want a balanced budget but not so easy to accept a cut in your favorite federal program. The day Americans summon the will to demand austerity, Congress will provide it. No constitutional amendment can substitute for that will.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, June 23, 1982]

COMPUTING THE COST OF A BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(By Gerald W. McEntee)

In recent testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Office of Management and Budget Director David Stockman said that the now favored the proposed balanced budget amendment. Administration supporters claim that the constitutional amendment would impose needed fiscal restraint on a spendthrift federal government. With President Reagan's own budget deficit now expected to top $100 billion. Mr. Stockman's statements are a little like saying: "All the things I have done are good. Now let's make sure nobody ever does this again."

Support for the balanced budget amendment among many Republicans and some Democrats represents a convenient escapehatch for members of both parties. It is an ideological talisman they can hang around their necks while stumping for votes in the fall elections. It also shifts political fire away from this year's enormous federal deficits.

So far, the debate over the amendments has focused on political considerations. Very little thought has been given to the actual impact of the legislation.

All previous constitutional amendments, with the exception of the prohibition amendment, have been enacted to achieve goals which could not have been achieved by existing statute. The balanced budget amendment is an exception.

The amendment would write fiscal policy into the constitution. The result is that Congress and the president would have a far more limited range of options in dealing with economic circumstances, shifting financial conditions, and national security crises. Specific difficulties such as a surge in demand for entitlement benefits would be harder to address on a timely basis.

As soon as President Reagan endorsed the balanced budget amendment, the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees asked Data Resources Incorporated to initiate an economic simulation study of the proposal.

Among the DRI assumptions, and it's a pretty large assumption given the present political climate, is that President Reagan will get about half of his nondefense cuts this fiscal year. The DRI study also assumes implementation of the amendment in FY (fiscal year) 1985.

Here's what the DRI study found:

Unemployment would jump by 2,650,000, or 2.2 percent by FY 1987.

The total gross national product would decline by 5.6 percent by FY 1987, or a total of $519 billion between FY 1985 and FY 1987.

The federal budget in FY 1987 would be cut $163 billion. In fact, there would be an average federal budget decline of 14 percent for the years FY 1985–1987.

State and local government revenue would be slashed $49 billion in FY 1987.

Cutbacks averaging 14 percent in the federal budget would force large reductions in all major federal functions. For example totally eliminating federal grants to state and local government—that means closing down medicaid, social services, the Highway Trust Fund, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, waste water treatment, education aid, revenue sharing, and a host of other programs—would only save about $60 billion. That's less than half the cuts which would be required if the balanced budget amendment were law.

One of the major tradeoffs, say supporters, would be reduced inflation. But, according to the DRI study, the inflation rate would only drop from 7.2 percent to 6.9 percent in FY 1987. So, we gain a three-tenths of 1 percent advantage over the cost of living if the amendment is in force in 1987. In return, we pay for each one-tenth of a percent drop in inflation with 900,000 jobs!

The balanced budget amendment is a poor solution to mounting federal deficits. In addition, it would severely hamper policymaking. The amendment should be rejected by the Congress because it will not stand the test of time, or circumstances.

[From the Los Angeles Times, May 31, 1982]

ON BALANCE, A BAD IDEA

President Reagan, facing a string of budget deficits higher than any in American history, wants to amend the Constitution to make them go away.

Given the circumstances, it is an idea wholly without logic, except the desperate logic of a man caught fishing in a neighbor's lake who might argue for stricter enforcement of poaching laws.

A Constitution that forces Congress to balance the budget every year is, in the abstract, a comforting thought that probably has broad appeal for taxpayers.

That may have crossed the President's mind when he lobbed up the idea during his Thursday television address designed to marshal support in his budget confrontation with Congress.

But most budget specialists doubt that such an amendment would work any more than the United Nations has stopped wars or than laws against stealing stop people from stealing.

Given the inventiveness of government when it is determined to spend money, a constitutional stricture probably would leave Americans even more in the dark about where their money goes than they are now.

Even without the pressure of the Constitution, Congress often creates special accounts to finance federal programs that do not show up on the budget. Such an amendment would make the temptation to hide spending even greater.

Strict enforcement of such an amendment would throw the Reagan Administration into chaos today unless it were willing to conspire with Congress to hide more than $100 billion in federal expenditures.

David A. Stockman, the President's budget director, understands the flaws in the concept. During his confirmation hearings last year, Stockman testified that a balanced-budget amendment is not "a very workable solution."

For one thing, he said, there is no accepted definition of spending. In a dispute, the question would be thrown to the courts becasue there is no other mechanism for enforcing such a restriction. Once involved, the courts probably would not stop short of writing their own version of a budget.

The President put the amendment proposal in a context of carrots and sticks. He has tried the carrot of negotiations to persuade Congress to hold down spending, he said, and now it is time to turn to the balanced-budget stick.

Stockman clearly believes that an amendment would be a paper stick that would buckle and wrap itself around the first big deficit it hit. We agree.

We also feel that budget arithmetic has no place in a Constitution that is devoted to absolute rights and obligations under law. Budgets are bound to economies which rise and fall without regard to absolute law. It would be a serious mistake to mix the two.

ENACTMENT OF THE SMALL BUSINESS INNOVATION DEVELOPMENT ACT

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, today represents a major watershed for small business. Today, I watched as the President signed into law the Small Business Innovation Development Act, legislation which I was proud to cosponsor, and which several of us have worked on for many months.

I would once again like to commend Senator RUDMAN for his outstanding leadership in bringing the innovation bill through the legislative process. Believe me, that was no easy accomplishment. The opposition was tough, but in the end, thanks to Senator RUDMAN and other dedicated supporters, such as Congressman JOHN LAFALCE, who did a superb job of promoting the bill in the House, the small business community was the winner.

I also want to thank this administration for its unwavering support of S. 881, the original version of this bill. By signing this bill into law today, President Reagan has shown that he recognizes and appreciates the contributions that small business makes to our economy in the form of innovations, jobs and technological advancement. This new law will increase the opportunity of small business to make those contributions, and thus will benefit us all in the years ahead.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, today I had the honor and the priviledge, with many others, to witness the President sign S. 881 into law. The ceremony was significant because it represented, I believe, a major step in the President's economic recovery program. The President endorsed S. 881 early in the legislative process and worked to insure its passage in both the House and Senate. I commend him for his leadership and look forward with him to a reaping of the benefits that will flow from the legislation.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate my distinguished colleague from New Hampshire, Senator RUDMAN, chairman of the Subcommittee on Innovation and Technology, and my distinguished colleague from Connecticut, Senator WEICKER, chairman of the Small Business Committee, on the Enactment of Senate bill 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981.

Together, Senators RUDMAN and WEICKER fought a minefield of objections, and a gauntlet of procedural maneuvers, to bring to the floor and pass, a bill that will provide badly needed funds to the thousands of American small businesses that engage in research and development.

As we all know, R. & D. is the linchpin of our economy—the driving force behind our great technology advances of the past and the expansion of productivity in the future. High technology companies are providing a greater share of new employment opportunities, with rapidly increasing productivity and lower prices. And small firms perform even better on these measures, producing many times the innovations per R. & D. dollar than their larger counterparts. And yet, less than 4 percent of Federal R. & D. funds presently go to small business. This legislation provides not only more funds for small R. & D. firms, but does it with a program that has proven its efficacy. The NSF program, after which this legislation is modeled, has been very successful—providing a phased and rational means of bringing new companies into the Federal R. & D. network.

I applaud the sponsors and promoters of this bill. Research and development is one of the essential ingredients to getting our economy back on track. This program will help insure that development.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, we celebrate a modest victory today as the President signed into law the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982. The measure requires Federal agencies with annual research and development budgets of more than $100 million to set aside 1.25 percent of those funds for small firms and independent innovators.

One might ask: Why is such a sensible action the cause for celebration? The answer to that is that this "sensible" legislation, approved in the Senate by 90 to 0, and in the House by 353 to 57, was subjected to one of the strongest lobby efforts mounted in the last several years against a so-called "small business" bill. While statistics consistently show that small and independent operators are more innovative and flexible than many large firms or university laboratories, some of our most prestigious universities and health organizations mounted a very vocal opposition campaign. Some of the most respected newspapers in the country printed the opposition point of view almost word-for-word. The campaign succeeded in making passage a difficult, contentious procedure where it should have received proper consideration and been passed in a more measured way. But we who support the measure did overcome and the President gave it his support.

The bill calls for a program modeled after the very successful one that the National Science Foundation pioneered, and I extend to them my most sincere compliments for the way they conducted the program and the results they achieved. As an original cosponsor of the Senate version, S. 881, I chaired a small business committee hearing in the "Silicon Valley" area of California, where so many brilliant, small innovators have made that name synonymous with creativity and progressive action. It is the place where, according to George Gilder in his popular book, "Wealth and Poverty," a second industrial revolution erupted. Gilder wrote:

> It happened in hundreds of small companies, these were the boffins, the callow geniuses of the semiconductor and microprocessor revolution, turning the world's most common matter, the substance of sand, into an incomparable resource of mind: A silicon chip the size of a fly, with computing powers thousands of times greater than a million monks adding and subtracting for millennia—an infinitesimal marvel that extends the reach of the human brain incomparably further than oil, steel, and machines had multiplied man's muscle in the industrial age.

Many of these "boffins" stepped out of the university laboratories and scientific libraries into the vanguard of modern industry. Perhaps this is what the opposing university spokesmen feared, but it is something our civilization must keep alive if the United States is to retain its technological wizardry.

We now have it as a law of our land to spend a portion of our huge research and development budgets with small high-technology firms and innovators for Government-approved R. & D. projects in areas ranging from defense and space to biomedical research. It will not be easy to make the program a success. The most important role now must be played by the small innovators themselves to qualify for the grants and to fulfill the promise we know is there. We are counting on them.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am very pleased to see the results of a year's worth of legislative work and compromise finally come to fruit with the Presidential approval of S. 881, otherwise known as the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981.

The accomplishments of small businesses in providing the market with new technology and responding to changing market conditions have always been, and continue to be, remarkable. It is a well known fact that small businesses continually outperform large businesses in the area of research and development. A study by the Office of Management and Budget indicates that between the years of 1953 and 1973, almost half of all major U.S. innovations came from firms with less than 1,000 employees.

Small business innovations not only supply the Nation with vital new technology, but also provide the Nation with additional jobs. A MIT study indicates that firms with 500 or less employees provided 87 percent of all new jobs in the United States between 1969 and 1976. In fact, this study identified small technology firms as the best job creators in the Nation.

Despite this evidence, Federal research and development funds have consistently bypassed small firms. In 1980, for example, 60 percent of total research and development funds were conducted into only 35 firms.

As passed by Congress, this legislation allocates 1.25 percent of research and development funds from each Federal agency with an R. & D. budget over $100 million to small business.

After the system has been phased in, some $400 million of Federal research and development funds will be specifically targeted for small high technology firms. Targeting funds in this way will, in my opinion ease our entrance into the high technology era and simultaneously increase our Nation's productivity.

As we all know, the U.S. productivity level has fallen well below that of other industrial nations over the past 10 years. While this decline can be attributed to a variety of factors, the slowdown in technological innovation has certainly been a primary one. This bill will lay a solid foundation for reversing this trend, by allocating research dollars to that sector of the business community who has already made outstanding contributions in this field.

Consequently, I am also of the belief that this bill admirably complements President Reagan's wish to stimulate the economy and enhance national productivity.

For these reasons, I am delighted and honored to have been a cosponsor of this legislation and I thank my colleagues whose support and hard work have made this day possible.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, these are times of debilitating economic hardship. No one can refute this fact. Unemployment is at a staggeringly high 9.5 percent. In addition, there were 522 business failures during the week of July 1, 1982. During the same week last year, there were only 292. This year to date, there have been a total of 11,948 business failures, while last year, there were 8,235 during the same period. As public servants, we are entrusted with the grave responsibility of serving the vital interests of this Nation. Part of this responsibility entails the creation of a thriving, burgeoning America in which a high standard of living, healthful growth and productivity, and full employment prevail. We should try unceasingly to reach these laudable goals.

As an original cosponsor of S. 881, I believe that this bill, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1981, will move our Nation along the path toward attainment of these coveted goals. S. 881 mandates that all Federal agencies with annual research and development budgets of more than $100 million establish small business innovation research programs to tap the resources of small innovative firms; to facilitate the conversion of federally funded research results into commercially viable products and services; and to increase the share of the Federal R. & D. budget allocated to small business, beginning with two-tenths of 1 percent in the first year, rising to 1.25 percent in the fourth year. No agency can reduce the percentage they are currently allocating to small business concerns.

In the United States, 96 percent of all businesses are small businesses. They produce 43 percent of the private sector gross national product. Furthermore, a National Science Foundation study concludes that small business is approximately 4 times as innovative as medium-sized firms and approximately 24 times as innovative as the largest firms. Yet a study by the Office of Management and Budget's Office of Federal Procurement Policy reveals that only 3.5 percent of total Federal R. & D. funds go to small firms.

Small businesses are superior cost-effective innovators, holding the key that will unlock the door to an economic revival. Small businesses excel at technical innovation, which leads to job creation. This innovation also enhances productivity and spurs economic growth. In addition, by strengthening the role of small firms in federally funded R. & D., our Nation's role as a world leader in technological innovation will be preserved.

Therefore, I ardently supported the passage of S. 881, and I commend the President for signing it into law. S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1981, will serve our Nation well by tapping one of its crucial, most valuable resources, the small business community.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, as one of the original cosponsors and a strong supporter of S. 881, the Small Business Development Act of 1982, I am pleased today to speak on behalf of this important piece of legislation.

S. 881 will provide for a phased-in process by which 1.25 percent of Federal research dollars will be set aside for utilization by small business firms. By bringing this concept to fruition, we are encouraging two outcomes of vital importance to the U.S. economy—expansion of innovative technology and stimulation of the vital small business sector.

The United States has long been a leader in advancement of scientific and technological research and development. In recent years, however, international competition has increased and we must strive more intensely to maintain the edge needed for an expanding economy. An important part of our commitment as Members of Congress is to pursue policies which help to make this happen. By setting aside this percentage of Federal research dollars for awards to small businesses, we are acting on our faith in the innovative and productive capacity of this segment of our economy. I do not believe we will be disappointed.

History indicates that a significant percentage of new technology is the product of entrepreneurs who have the creativity and the flexibility to put untried ideas into practical use. These individuals and their coworkers can be credited with many of the inventions and technological advancements that have improved all of our lives. This administration and this Congress are making important strides toward the goal of using Government to promote rather than deter this innovative activity. I am pleased to be a part of efforts to achieve this goal and I feel S. 881 is a significant step in the right direction.

It is a credit to the efforts of Senator RUDMAN and many of my other colleagues in the Senate and the House that this measure has proceeded to passage in such a timely fashion. President Reagan, who has been a consistent advocate on behalf of measures which encourage growth of the private sector, has expressed his support by signing S. 881 into law. I commend the President and the Members of Congress for moving forward with this legislation. I feel it will make a significant contribution to the expansion of technological innovation and the strengthening of our economy.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, today the President signed into law S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982. His approval represents both the culmination of many years of work by small business advocates within and outside of Government to reach this point, as well as a starting point for the small business entrepeneur to increase their participation in meeting Federal research and development needs. The President's approval also represents a significant milestone in the visibility and strength of our Nation's small business community.

Mr. President, the Federal Government devotes over $44 billion of its agencies' budgets for research and development. The Federal Government also funds over half of all research and development work in this Nation. Yet, our best estimates are that the same small businesses which have repeatedly been shown to have the greatest potential for inventions and innovations, have only received approximately 5 percent of those R. & D. funds.

The enactment today of the Small Business Development Act of 1982 will begin a concerted effort to increase the historical share of small business participation in the Government's research programs.

We know that the small business innovation research (SBIR) programs which will be established in 11 agencies pursuant to this legislation can be successful. We have a track record to prove it. For example, since 1977, Congress directed the National Science Foundation to set aside a specific portion of its research and development budget to help promote research by small business. The program works. Similarly, the Department of Defense unilaterally established its own small business advanced technology program (DESAT). Their program works.

The Small Business Innovation Development Act which the President has approved, has been closely modeled after these two programs. It is most important to underscore that, throughout the development of this legislation, my primary concern has been to assure that the research that is conducted by the non-Federal sector be of the highest quality, and that there are sufficient controls in place to insure that agencies have the flexibility to design, fund, and carry out their research needs. I am satisfied that this law meets those tests.

Mr. President, I again want to congratulate Senator RUDMAN, the chairman of the Small Business Committee's Innovation and Technology Subcommittee, for his continued outstanding leadership on this legislation since its introduction in April 1981. Similarly, Senator WEICKER, the chairman of the full committee, has consistently worked to bring about the final passage of this proposal. Many others in and outside of Congress, too numerous to mention, have had a significant role in shaping this legislation from its inception in 1979 through today.

I am sure that the dedication that my congressional colleagues, Small Business Administration officials, and the small business community have shown in bringing this bill to the White House for the President's signature will be continued as we carefully review the crucial next step of implementation. Today marks the first day of our renewed efforts to increase small business participation in this Nation's vital research missions.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues in expressing great satisfaction over the passage of the Small Business Innovation Act, and its signature into law by the President. It is good legislation, good for small business, and good for the country as we strive to improve our competitiveness worldwide.

Research and development are key to that competitiveness, and we already know that in the past, major innovations introduced into the market were produced 24 times more frequently by small business than by big business. Small business outshone medium sized businesses four times. Other statistics show that firms with less than 500 employees provided 87 percent of all new jobs in the United States between 1969 and 1976, and the best job creator was found to be the small technology based firm.

With such evidence, it is surprising that there is any hesitancy in supporting research and development by small firms. Well, we have now finally shown we do support such efforts. This new law will help small businesses obtain "a piece of the pie." Sure, it might be easier for the dispensers of research funds simply to give out the money to large, well represented firms which can spend a lot of money being represented. But the evidence is that once they get such funds, they are not as good at turning out the final innovative product. Small business does that best. Yes, it might take a little more effort to be sure small business gets a chance to obtain such funds, but we can no longer afford to ignore our best resource.

This act does that. I am proud to have been a cosponsor of the original legislation. I am proud that it has become law. And I am proud that we are taking another step forward in making ourselves more competitive.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today is an important day for small business and this Nation. Today, President Reagan signed into law S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Act of 1981. I am pleased he has taken this action.

I believe this act holds great potential for small business, the Government, and the economy. Small businesses selected to do research under the Small Business Innovation Research (SBIR) programs established by this act will receive up-front capital so necessary to initiate research in their field of expertise.

The Government, in turn, will make use of the demonstrated innovative capabilities of small firms in achieving the Government's R. & D. goals. Moreover, increased reliance on small businesses for the Government's R. & D. needs should insure greater competition for Government research and a higher quality of research.

Finally, the economy as a whole should benefit. The act encourages private-sector investments to commercialize the research conducted by small businesses under the SBIR program. Commercialization of many of the newly developed technologies and processes will ultimately create new products and improve the competitiveness of American goods and services in the world marketplace, thereby increasing employment and tax revenues.

Nevertheless, despite the great potential this act holds, I am aware that a number of universities are deeply concerned about a significant reduction in Government-funded basic research by universities, as well as a reduction in the quality of Government-funded research generally. As signed into law, the act contains the substance of an amendment proposed by Senator SCHMITT which would prohibit agencies from "raiding" their basic research funding in order to support the SBIR programs. In addition, the act contains, in a slightly altered form, an amendment proposed by Senator GLENN requiring the General Accounting Office (GAO) to report on the operation of the SBIR programs and to review the effect of these programs on agencies' overall basic research programs. It is my hope these changes will ease somewhat the concerns of the universities.

Again, Mr. President, I am pleased this legislation has been signed into law.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I take note of the President's signing of the Small Business Innovation Act. The passage of this bill is a clear demonstration of this Government's belief in the unique productiveness of the small business community. The level of commitment it represents stems from a confidence in the special role the small business community plays in generating the new ideas needed to fuel tomorrow's economic growth. A flourishing small business community full of new firms with new products and ideas offers us the greatest prospects for significant economic growth.

Earmarking a small percentage of research and development budgets of Federal agencies acknowledges the fact that it takes more effort to work with a number of small firms than with a handful of larger organizations. This bill creates the administrative incentive to make that additional effort. I am convinced we will find this extra effort well rewarded by a high return in innovation and job creation.

Concern has been expressed that this measure will result in harmful cutbacks in research and development funds to other nonprofit research organizations like our universities. I believe these sentiments are more a product of the prospects of cutbacks in overall civilian research and development budgets.

The percentage earmarked for small businesses in this legislation is small: 0.1 percent in the first year; 0.3 percent in the second year; 0.5 percent in the third year; 1 percent in the fourth year; and 1.25 percent in all subsequent years.

During this 5-year phase-in, I urge all of my colleagues to work to diminish the concerns of the university community by reversing the dangerous trend of reductions in research and development budgets. These cutbacks are the worst form of false economy. When we reduce our financial commitment to research and development we reduce our investment in a brighter economic future.

There can be no more discouraging sign of our commitment to long-term economic growth than finding the sources of tomorrow's wealth, the research and development community, reduced to struggling over a shrinking pie of financial commitment. By passing this legislation we have affirmed our commitment to the small business community. I would like to encourage my colleagues to follow this action by redoubling our commitment to the larger research and development community.

I would like to close by thanking a few of my colleagues for their special efforts on behalf of this legislation. Senators RUDMAN, WEICKER, NUNN, HUDDLESTON, KENNEDY, and LEVIN all deserve particular credit for their vigorous and longstanding efforts on behalf of this legislation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to take this time to comment on the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981, which the President has signed. This bill, of which I was a cosponsor, is designed to increase the role of small business in Federal research programs. The support of the President, as well as the 90 to 0 vote that the bill obtained in the Senate, are important steps forward for small firms engaged in technological research, as well as an important instrument for insuring that the U.S. Government utilizes the most efficient form of technological research.

The United States is quickly losing its status as the world leader in the area of technological advancement. Countries such as West Germany and Japan are making more efficient use of their research and development funding than the United States.

It has been proven that small businesses provide the most cost efficient technological research in the United States, despite the fact that small businesses are continually discriminated against in the selection process used to make research contracts.

Large businesses and large universities and research institutions continue to receive most of the government's major research grants, despite the great efficiency of small business. Furthermore, small businesses are the largest employers in the United States, and possess the greatest potential for job growth in the country.

S. 881 not only approaches the problem of loss of American status in the research and development area, but also proposes answers for the growing problem of unemployment in the United States. It stimulates technological advancement and makes Federal research and development spending much more efficient than it is presently. It accomplishes these two goals while also stimulating economic growth in the sector of the American economy that has the greatest potential to provide work for the large number of unemployed in the United States.

The specific details of S. 881 are modeled after the National Science Foundation small innovation research program, which has been successfully stimulating the use of small businesses in the NSF's research projects for 5 years.

S. 881 mandates that agencies that have a research and development budget of more than $100 million, allocate 1 percent of their research budget to projects that are being handled by small businesses. The funds that are allocated to small businesses will be used to develop technology that is commercially feasible as well as technologically important.

The funding for the commercial processing of this technology will be supplied by the private sector. This means an increase in investment, which the American economy needs so badly. The technical assistance given to these firms will increase their competitiveness. All of this will be accomplished with the use of currently available funds. There will be a reallocation of funds from large businesses and research institutions, to efficient small businesses. Therefore, in the long run, it will save the American Government money by better utilizing the resources available.

All in all, the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981 will be beneficial to the American Government, the economy, and the people of the United States.●

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer my support for S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1982. I also praise the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. RUDMAN) for his excellent insight in best improving Federal support for business.

This legislation comes at a most critical time for business when such congressional action is essential and can stimulate economic growth. The major advantage of this bill is that it increases aid to small business. Fifty percent of all major innovations come from firms with fewer than 1,000 employees. In other words, small business plays a significant role in overall business productivity.

Yet, small firms presently have inadequate access to Federal Research & Development (R. & D.) money. This occurs despite the fact that a National Science Foundation survey showed that smaller firms produce up to 24 times more innovation per R. & D. dollar than larger ones.

Without increasing the Federal budget, this proposal provides small enterprises up to $400 million more per year for R. & D.—a significant improvement.

By allowing more small businesses access to Federal R. & D. funds, business productivity will increase as will the overall economic climate. Ultimately, all Americans will benefit by improved economic conditions.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, passage of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act, by the Congress and its approval by President Reagan demonstrate the serious concern Congress has for the backbone of this country's economic system, our small businesses. By earmarking 1¼ percent of an agency's Research and Development funds for small business we are encouraging that segment of our business area that contributes to new ideas almost imperceptibly.

We all know that small businesses are our most efficient resource and also provide the lion's share of all new jobs created each year. Many of them are high-technology firms which have an exceptional record of developing new ideas, new products and processes that contribute to the progress of our Nation. Both the private and public sectors are beneficiaries of the unique contributions made by America's small businesses.

Mr. President, all of us can take pride in this piece of legislation which is long overdue.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as one of the cosponsors of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act, I am pleased to note that President Reagan signed this bill into law today.

This bill will add to our Nation's productivity by increasing the involvement of small businesses, the most dynamic and innovative sector of our economy, in our research and development efforts. Rather than allowing government bureaucrats to award all R. & D. contracts to large corporations with an established reputation, this bill will require that they earmark 1.25 percent of their R. & D. budget for small businesses on a competitive bid basis.

Since the Federal Government accounts for about half of all the R. & D. work done in the United States, government policies on R. & D. spending have a major impact on both small business companies interested in R. & D. and in the amount of technological research in this country. Studies have repeatedly shown that small businesses are more cost effective in developing innovative new ideas.

According to the National Science Foundation, small businesses produced about half of all major U.S. innovations over a 20-year period. They produce four times more innovations per R. & D. employee than do large firms, and small firms produce up to 24 times more innovation per R. & D. dollar than do large firms.

The importance of innovation to the American economy cannot be overstated. It has been estimated that 50 percent of American economic growth stems from technological innovation. As it has been established that small business R. & D. efforts provide the greatest return on our technological investment, I believe that the Small Business Innovation Act is clearly an important step forward.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am pleased President Reagan has signed into law the Small Business Innovation Development Act, and I am proud to have been a cosponsor of this important legislation.

Small business truly is a cornerstone in our free enterprise system. Small firms employ over half of the labor force, and account for 38 percent of the Nation's gross national product.

Small businesses are traditionally leaders in innovation and technological advancement. They provide the combined energies of individual initiative with a firsthand knowledge of consumer needs to play one of the most vital roles in our economy.

Through this new law, a stronger research and development relationship between the small business sector and the Federal Government is created. The Small Business innovation research program at the National Science Foundation has been found effective and well-run. By mandating SBIR programs, the bill will improve and expand our country's research and development efforts, which are necessary to the restoration of a healthy and strong national economy.

I believe this legislation provides new ways to meet current economic challenges, and I want to commend the Small Business Committee and its able chairman, the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), for the superb work they have done in getting this initiative before the Senate and enacted into law.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, the Small Business Innovation Act, introduced last year by Senators WEICKER and RUDMAN and signed today by President Reagan, is a major victory for small business nationwide.

In my own State of Maine, I am reminded daily that small businesses are the economic and commercial backbone of our communities. If we are serious about creating jobs and strengthening the economy, we must help the small and independent businessman survive and prosper. The Small Business Innovation Act, in my view, is an important step in the recognition of small business' ability to actively contribute to our economic health.

Small businesses account for 97 percent of the Nation's total business units and create over 50 percent of the jobs in the U.S. work force. It is reasonable and responsible for the Federal Government to offer this important sector of our national economy every opportunity to participate in federally-funded research and development activities.

I have no doubt that small businesses nationwide will benefit from this legislation and, in turn, the benefits will be passed on to both consumers and taxpayers. I am pleased to have been involved in this piece of legislation and I am certain that the economic benefits will soon be recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I commend President Reagan as well as Members of both the Senate and the House for making the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982 law. This is an excellent piece of legislation which will prove beneficial not only to the small businesses to which it is directed but also to the Nation at large. This Senator is confident that our goals of increased productivity, more jobs, and new and better products will be enhanced by this act.

For over 200 years, small businesses have been the backbone of this great Nation. In an economy sometimes dominated by Goliaths, small firms often produce like Davids. Small businesses account for a majority of new jobs in this country. In addition, research dollars funneled through small businesses multiply in resultant innovations. In spite of the heavy burden the current economic slowdown has placed on the small business community, this Senator reaffirms his belief that these firms can continue to benefit our economy in ways that belie their size.

Over the past decade, the rate of productivity increase in the United States has fallen behind that of many other developed countries. Our declining productivity is partly attributable to a slowdown in our rate of technological innovation. Yet, that segment of our private sector which leads in innovative advances—small business—has received a relatively small portion of Federal research and development grants. If the United States is to remain a competitive and productive force in today's world markets, we must make as efficient use as possible of our limited research and development resources. Thus, without appropriating any additional funds, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982 will set aside some of the research and development funds awarded by Federal agencies for small businesses.

Mr. President, this legislation will foster increased economic activity and new jobs—not by large spending programs, but through better use of available resources. By diverting a portion of research and development funds to smaller firms, we are consciously recognizing the role that technological innovation and development must play in the reignition of our economic system. That we may be so confident that our scientists and engineers will, with products and inventions heretofore not conceived, carry our economic banner into the next century is testimony to our great economic system itself—and to the spirit of our people.

This act is the kind of legislation with which we can all take heart. Without raising taxes or appropriating additional funds, we have a program which will create new jobs, stimulate economic growth, and augment this Nation's competitive posture abroad. With a broadening base of wage earners, perhaps complemented by a simplified and more equitable tax system desired by many of us, we can truly be confident of our future. By ordering priorities within the parameters of existing funding levels, and not by expanding or inventing spending programs, Congress, in enacting the Small Business Innovation Act of 1982, has truly taken a positive step.

Mr. EAST. Mr. President, the passage of the Small Business Innovation Development Act will be of incalculable benefit to the small business community and to the Nation as a whole. This act requires Federal agencies with research and development budgets above $100 million to set aside 1.25 percent of those funds for small firms. Thus, without increasing the Federal budget, we will assist small business in developing new products and new technologies to enrich our national life.

I do not denigrate the importance of pure scientific research or the contributions of the scientific community. Nevertheless, I do not think we should lose sight of all that we owe to inventor-entrepreneurs. Samuel Morse was a painter; the Wright brothers were bicycle repairmen; Alexander Graham Bell was a teacher of the deaf. Yet these visionary amateurs gave us the telegraph, the airplane, and the telephone. In our own day we owe the Xerox machine and the Polaroid camera to the same type of individual.

Small businesses are frequently pioneers in all kinds of new endeavors. They are also more likely to take the major risks without which material progress is impossible.

Mr. President, we are frequently told nowadays that America is losing its competitive edge. I reject this notion. I believe that this new legislation will help us to retain our honored position as the world's leading innovator. I salute the small business community of America, and I hope it will exploit to the full the opportunities presented by the Small Business Innovation Development Act.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with many of my distinguished colleagues this day in honoring the small business community of America. This is an appropriate time for us to acknowledge the importance this sector of America's free enterprise system has in this country and the role it will play in its future. President Reagan today has signed S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981. The 97th Congress, which has made important strides in reviving the economy, can be proud of its efforts to get this revolutionary piece of legislation into the President's hands.

We all know that small business men and women represent a strong force within the American economic system and serve a basic structural element of our free enterprise system. The enactment into law of S. 881 will reinforce this structure, and will make research and development funds more available to small businesses. A great deal of research has been conducted over the years which has consistently documented where the innovative sector of this country lies, and I am delighted that the Congress has now recognized these studies and acted accordingly. Some of these facts have been stated and restated on this floor many times, but they deserve to be repeated once again. Among other things, firms with fewer than 1,000 employees are responsible for one-half of the major U.S. innovations. Furthermore, the smaller firms are more cost-effective, producing up to 24 times more innovations per research and development dollar expended than larger firms. When one considers that small businesses account for 43 percent of the gross national product, we probably should insure that even more Federal money is made available to the small firms of this country. I do not consider myself anti-big business or pro-small business, but rather pro-business, and Federal research and development funds should be available to all businesses no matter the size of the firm. I am very pleased with the signing into law of S. 881 and the long-term benefits it will help to provide, directly and indirectly.

Since small firms have one of the fastest rates of growth in net new employment, sales, exports, productivity, net revenue, and tax dollars in our economy, this legislation should play a major role in strengthening our economy in future years. Small business needs and deserves this sort of support and assistance. I hope that the recognition of this fact, as signified by the enactment of this legislation, providing expanded funding for research and development, will mean that the Congress and the administration will give growth attention to the small business sector and continue to search for ways of improving their ability to play their vital role in the American economy. We should make a concerted effort to do something about the burdensome regulations and redtape that hinder small businesses from thriving and functioning effectively. I urge the administration to move rapidly to implement the provisions of S. 881 as soon as possible.

Again, Mr. President, I commend the work of the sponsors and supporters in both the House and the Senate, and I applaud the President, who today is inaugurating a Federal program that is warranted, overdue, and of great benefit in both the short-term and the long-term process of our Nation's small business community. We can be proud of this accomplishment.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982, I would like to congratulate my colleagues, Senators RUDMAN and WEICKER, the sponsors of this measure, for their success in gaining passage of this legislation.

It is a well known fact in industry that small firms are often the most innovative segment of our economy. Though they are the most efficient users of research and development resources, small businesses have not been given the opportunity they need to participate in Federal R. & D. programs because of their limited resources.

It is now estimated that only 3.5 to 4 percent of the Federal R. & D. dollar is spent with small firms. This low proportion is not only unacceptable and unfair, it is short-sighted as well, considering the excellent past record small businesses have compiled and the potential contributions that they can make—job creation, innovations, tax revenues, and export sales.

Small firms would benefit from the assistance of additional Federal R. & D. contracts, and so would the taxpayer. Small firms are efficient and careful in their use of funds and have no large bureaucracy to support.

The taxpayer will benefit in other ways, especially through job creation. Small businesses of 100 or fewer employees create over 85 percent of all new jobs in the United States. In my home State of Pennsylvania, for example, over 70 percent of all workers are employees of small businesses and 99.6 percent of all firms have 500 employees or less. Clearly, small businesses and the jobs they create are an integral part of Pennsylvania's economy. Nationwide, they are an essential key to our country's economic rejuvenation.

Because of the importance of small business in our economy, I cosponsored the Small Business Innovation Development Act. This legislation would insure that small businesses obtain a portion of Federal research funds by requiring each qualifying agency to devote a part of its R. & D. budget to fund small, innovative businesses. Under this act, certain Federal agencies would establish small business innovation research programs to carry out the provisions of the bill. These programs would be similar to those of the National Science Foundation.

Mr. President, we know this program can work in most agencies. The National Science Foundation program has been especially successful. The Department of Defense has also recognized the importance of introducing small business participation into its research efforts by creating its own small business research program.

The purpose of S. 881 is not to infringe upon the funding available to large firms and educational institutions, but rather to utilize all segments of our Nation's development resources in Federal R. & D. programs, and I emphasize it will not result in additional Federal expenditures.

Mr. President, the time has come for us to invest in the entrepreneurial talent of small businesses by including them in Federal R. & D. programs. By doing so, we use Federal funds more efficiently and help spur innovation, and it is innovation which is critical to sustain our technological edge in highly competitive foreign markets.

Mr. President, I join my colleagues in encouraging the President to sign into law the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982. The potential contributions of small business enterprises are too great to ignore. This legislation is good for small business, good for the U.S. economy, and good for the American taxpayer.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, the small business sector is the backbone of the American economy. Much of the innovation and technology development that has made the American economy prominent in the world as an industrial power emanated directly from the small business sector. The innovative, high technology industries of today that are forging new frontiers in the commercial and scientific world are composed largely of small businesses. Numerous studies have shown that productivity growth in small firms is the primary engine for productivity growth in the Nation's economy. Little wonder, then, that studies on job generation have shown that about 80 percent of new job growth in this country comes from the small business sector.

For too long, public policy has overlooked these startling facts about the importance of the small business sector. An equally important, and related, area of benign neglect in public policy is in the transfer of scientific knowledge from the laboratory to the commercial world. A long gestation period is often required before advances in basic science result in improved industrial technologies and marketable goods and services. Unfortunately, small, innovative businesses have been denied an important role in Federally funded basic and applied research on the assumption that this can best be done by universities, large corporations and Federal laboratories. The result is that potentially new technologies and products that would raise productivity and strengthen the American economy lay dormant for long periods, often decades.

The Small Business Innovation Act of 1981 will rectify this deficiency by giving small, innovative businesses more competitive access to Federal R. & D. funds. The commercial application of new advances in science are often impeded by technical and engineering barriers that must be overcome. The Small Business Innovation Act of 1981, by giving small businesses access to Federal R. & D. funds will be able to remove these barriers and impediments in a more efficient manner. The result will be a speeding up of the process of technological transfer to the betterment of the American economy.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Act of 1982. I am a cosponsor of this important legislation, which will contribute to the creativity and innovation of America's small businesses.

Massive layoffs by large corporations in my home State of Wisconsin have seriously hindered economic productivity and growth. Opportunities created by this bill will pump new life into Wisconsin's economic climate through small businesses. Research studies have shown that small businesses efficiently and effectively utilize research and development (R. & D.) dollars in a manner not capable of larger companies. Continued nurturing of small businesses through R. & D. funding creates many opportunities for improved technology.

This bill will prove beneficial not only to small businesses but, just as importantly, to American taxpayers. Increased R. & D. can result in additional jobs, increased productivity, improvement in personal lifestyles and a healthy economic atmosphere.

There will be only winners, no losers through the implementation of this bill. Quick enactment of the Small Business Innovation Act will be a sound investment in the future welfare of all.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today, President Reagan signed the Small Business Innovation Research Act. I am proud to rise today with many of my colleagues and praise this very important piece of legislation. Not only does this legislation give small business a chance to compete on a more equal basis for research and development grants from Government agencies but it does not cost the American taxpayer anything.

This legislation establishes a small business innovation program for every Federal agency that currently spends more than $100 million a year in research and development. These innovation programs will be modeled after the highly successful one run by the National Science Foundation. Each agency will set aside a small percentage, increasing to 1.2 percent over a 5-year period, of their budget for the program. Granted, 1.2 percent appears to be a small, insignificant figure but with our massive Federal budget this could amount to over $1 billion for small firms over the next 5 years. This is much needed incentive in an industry severely strangled by high interest rates.

Over the years small business has been ignored for their massive contributions to our society. Not only has small business provided the majority of growth and innovation over the years but, small business employs over half of the private sector work force and over the past 5 years has generated over 80 percent of the new jobs in this Nation. Now, due to simplified procedures, small firms compete for research grants from the Government. Before this legislation was enacted, small companies could not justify the time and effort it took to fight a losing battle in attempting to acquire a Government contract. Besides the complicated procedures that must be conquered, the rules are stacked against small business.

President Reagan, in his March 1 message to Congress on small business, cited the "success of the American economy is critically dependent upon the preservation of real opportunity for small business." This administration, even more so than previous Republican administrations, is committed to small business. Specifically, the President has a strong desire to "assure unrestricted access for small business to all segments of our economy." The President went further in his statement and says that "by unleashing small business from the burden of unnecessary taxation and regulation, we enable men and women small business owners to increase their contributions to our society's economic and employment growth." I wholeheartedly agree with the President's assessment and feel that, as soon as he signs this legislation, a vehicle will be in place to help us accomplish this goal.

I applaud Senators RUDMAN, WEICKER, and the entire Small Business Committee for their hard work and diligence in producing this important piece of legislation. In the past, Government studies indicate that small firms are nearly three times as innovative as large firms. I compliment their continued efforts to release this pent up energy and creativity in a fashion that will help small business owners, the American people and not cost the taxpayer anything.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982, I am pleased that this act is being enacted into law. Senator RUDMAN and Senator WEICKER are to be commended for their efforts in obtaining congressional passage of this act.

This country is facing a relative decrease in technological innovation. For example, the U.S. Patent Office issued 61,227 patents in 1980, as opposed to 70,131 patents in 1970. Even more significant, the share of those patents issued to foreign residents increased from 25 to 40 percent. Given the close connection between a nation's productivity and its technological innovation, it should come as no surprise that our productivity growth rate has declined from 3 percent during the 1950's and the first half of the 1960's to negative rates during 1978, 1979, and 1980. If we are to remain competitive with the other industrial nations of the world these dangerous trends must be reversed.

A key part of the solution to the problem of declining technological innovation and productivity lies in unleashing the forces of the small businesses of this country. Small businesses and individual inventors consistently account for more than half of our inventions and innovations. Between 1953–73, small businesses produced 24 times as many technological innovations per research and development dollar as large businesses. Yet, despite these success rates, small businesses receive only 3.5 to 4 percent of the Federal research and development funds. This low percentage of funds received by small businesses becomes even more significant when it is recognized that the Federal Government finances approximately one-half of the research and developement that goes on in the United States.

The low level of small business participation in Federal research and development projects can be attributed to institutional barriers, particularly a preference by Federal agencies to deal with large firms. The Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982 would change this by requiring Federal agencies to set aside a portion of their outside research and development funds for small business contracts. The result of this set-aside program will be that small businesses will have the financial resources that they need to increase this Nation's technological innovations.

I am particularly pleased that the enactment of this legislation will mean a greater participation by Alaskan small businesses in Federal research and development projects in my State. As Alaska continues to help fill the energy and defense needs of the United States, there will be ever-increasing opportunities for research and development in those areas. The Arctic provides a vast natural laboratory were there are unique opportunities to study climatology and geophysics. Alaskan small businesses can make a significant contribution to research in these areas.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the signing of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982, into law is an important step which Congress has taken to show its support and encouragement for the small business community in its research and development activities. As cosponsor of this legislation, I am enthusiastic about the future growth of technological advancements in the United States.

At a time when our position in the world marketplace is declining, the need for technological advancements and innovations is great. Remaining competitive in the world marketplace will require our Government's help and support to private industry in their R. & D. efforts.

In the past, small companies have been discriminated, overlooked and under utilized, by the Federal Government's R. & D. procuring agencies. Although small business receives 60 percent of Federal R. & D. contracts under $10,000, small businesses receive only 24 percent of all Federal R. & D. contracts over $10,000 and 6.8 percent of the total of Federal contract expenditures.

It is unfortunate that the Government has continued to award R. & D. contracts to large business concerns when small firms are generally two and one-half times as innovative per employee as larger firms. Additionally, 99.8 percent of the businesses in the United States are small businesses. In my own State, the State of Delaware, all but 60 of the 12,000 businesses located in Delaware are small businesses.

By directing Federal R. & D. expenditures to small businesses, which will be accomplished through the Small Business Innovation Development Act, we are enhancing the ability of this country to remain a leader in the world marketplace. In addition, new job opportunities will result and venture capital will be made available to small firms who have been most adversely affected by the recession.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am happy to note that the Small Business

Innovation Research Act has now been passed by both Houses of Congress.

It was once said that what is good for General Motors is good for the United States. It can be just as accurately said that what is good for small business is perhaps even better for the United States. Small business provides a diversity of opportunities for work for people in commerce, industry, and service occupations. This range of opportunity is critical in a State such as Pennsylvania where we have disadvantaged ghetto youth, displaced workers in the mill towns of western Pennsylvania, and unemployed workers in our small rural communities. Many States share these problems.

In this time of economic problems, it was inventive for Senator RUDMAN to have introduced this bill which, rather than spending additional money, allocates a percentage of Government agency research and development funds for small business innovation research programs. I am especially pleased to have been a cosponsor of this bill.

The enactment of this legislation addresses the need for Government to help strengthen the technological capacity of the private sector. It is a much better course to look to the private sector, especially the small business portion, where increased productivity, greater cost consciousness and good old-fashioned American competition will assure a better deal for the taxpayer and the Government agencies rather than to expanding those agencies. This legislation, by requiring several major Federal departments and agencies to establish small business innovation research programs and to target specified amounts of research and development funds to small business, will accomplish these purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I speak as an enthusiastic supporter and cosponsor of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Development Act of 1982. This measure, by setting aside specified Federal research money for small businesses, recognizes the tremendous potential of small businesses to perform dramatic innovative research for the country.

Many studies have shown clearly that small business holds the keys to expanding employment and offers the most efficient means of carrying out high technology research.

Small businesses are producers almost of infinite variety, consumers of discrimination, testers, developers, trainers of the young, riskers and darers, social examples of thrift and enterprise.

A study done for the U.S. Office of Procurement Policy in 1977 concluded that:

> Small firms have compiled a striking record of innovation in the private sector. Firms with less than 1,000 employees accounted for almost one-half of major U.S. innovations during the period 1953–73 . . .

Other studies show that small firms, defined as those with 20 or fewer employees, created more than two-thirds of new employment in the private sector between 1969 and 1976.

Still, congressional testimony clearly establishes that small business research and development efforts are being short-changed by Federal procurement policies favoring the large defense industries. Through this carefully crafted legislation, Congress is decreeing a shift in policy that will reengage the high technology resources peculiarly inherent in small firms. I endorse one change made by the other body, which would limit the amount of basic research funds that could be diverted from any agency's budget to small business to 1.25 percent. I also regard favorably an additional provision added by the other body which exempts from the law the highly sensitive intelligence communities. By no means is this meant to imply that small business is not capable of handling the technology of modern intelligence gathering and analysis; rather, this provision is designed solely as a means of limiting access that otherwise would be expanded unwisely to these matters.

I am very optimistic for the bill and expect its benefits to the country will be very great. Its true success will depend on the willing adherence to the law of the agencies covered and to the ability of small business itself to fulfill the promise we anticipate for it.

Both may be assured that the Congress will monitor them closely and, for the sake of the country, wishes them well in their endeavors.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, our Nation stands alone in history as the standard of human initiative and freedom. Our form of government is unique in that it was established as a shield to protect God given freedoms and liberties from usurpation by tyranny.

Because we as a nation of free men and women are able to exercise these God given rights, we are a people known for our creativity and productivity. It is when we are not free or are in some way hindered in exercising these rights that creativity and productivity suffer.

To insure that this creativity and innovation are continued I am proud to be a cosponsor of S. 881, the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981. No sector of our society has added more to our national well-being than that of small business. When unhampered by Government interference, the creativity and inventiveness of men and women involved in private enterprise have led to major advances and improvements in our way of life. Much of what we enjoy every day has its origins in the creativity of small business.

Federal policymakers often forget the contributions of small firms. Small business has been our Nation's most efficient and fertile source of new technology. Between 1952 and 1973, small firms accounted for almost one-half of major U.S. innovations, and they did this 50-percent cheaper than if it had been done by large firms or the Government.

Also, small innovative businesses create jobs and stimulate economic growth. Between 1969 and 1976, small business provided 87 percent of all new jobs in the United States. We all know that innovation creates new jobs, increases productivity, adds to the competitiveness of U.S. products in overseas markets, and stimulates economic growth. Surely we are to be thankful that we have the creative force of the small businessman and woman.

But, Mr. President, I am very concerned that our Nation is not fully promoting and utilizing this vast creative resource. Over the past decade our Nation has experienced a decline in innovation. As other nations have increased their research efforts, we seem to have entered a period of little creative development. One of the causes of this decline is the failure of Federal policymakers to fully realize the suppressive effect of Federal involvement and legislation on small business' private enterprise creativity.

We in the Federal Government must provide the leadership that will create a climate where private innovation and creativity may once again flourish.

S. 881 goes far in doing this. Not only does it recognize the abilities of the individual and the private sector, it also seeks to stimulate increased private activity in the creation of new innovations. This can be promoted by requiring Federal agencies to allocate certain amounts of research and development funds to small business. The infusion of such funds into small business, the most prolific source of new technology, will spark a creative upsurge affecting all levels of our economic life for the better and increase our competitive stance among other nations.

Mr. President, I am pleased that small business and private enterprise are once again being recognized for the contributions they offer our society.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today President Reagan signed into law the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981. This legislation fulfills one of the top recommendations of the 1980 White House Conference on Small Business, and recognizes the critical role that small business plays in our national economy. It is well known that in terms of magnitude and impact, small business is among the most productive sectors of our economy, accounting for virtually all new private sector employment, at least half of all major innovations, and nearly 50 percent of our yearly GNP.

This legislation, which was approved unanimously by the Senate last December, will direct needed Federal attention and resources to our most productive areas. Some of the greatest successes that we have seen in this Nation in terms of large corporate entities such as A.T. & T., GM, Kellogg, and many thousands of others, began as small independent businesses, a few people with large ideas and practical knowhow. I believe that the maximum effort possible to encourage continuation of this historical trend should be made, and that the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981 is an important step in that direction.

As we are all painfully aware, our country has fallen behind in some areas of research and development, and we have seen a corresponding drop in productivity. I feel that this legislation will help to inspire new innovation and a resurgence of private sector development that is key to our economic revival. I firmly believe that the future health and vitality of the economy will depend in large measure upon the economic performance of small businesses. I would like to see a continuation of the beginning made by the Congress with the enactment of the Small Business Innovation Research Act of 1981. As an original cosponsor of this legislation in the Senate, I stand ready to continue this effort.

MISS APRIL ABEL OF JOHNSTON, S.C., AMERICA'S YOUNG MISS 1982-83

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the title of America's Young Miss is an exclusive distinction given to the young lady who possesses the highest qualities of beauty, talent, character, and charm. These characteristics accurately describe this year's winner, Miss April Abel, of Johnston, S.C., who was crowned America's Young Miss 1982-83 on June 26.

Miss Abel, the lovely 15-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. Ashley Abel, fulfilled her dream at the climax of a 3-day contest sponsored by America's National Pageant Productions. I am especially pleased that the pageant's sponsor chose Sumter, S.C., as this year's location for the event, and I know that Miss Abel was thrilled to receive this coveted award in her home State.

In addition to becoming America's Young Miss, Miss Abel was chosen as Miss Congeniality, and also won the talent award for her tap dance rendition of "It Don't Mean a Thing."

Mr. President, I take particular pride in Miss Abel's achievement because she is a student at the educational institution which bears my name, Strom Thurmond High School, in Edgefield, S.C. At Strom Thurmond High, she earned the title of Miss Freshman 1982, and she is an active member of the concert band and the student council.

Among the many prizes Miss Abel will receive are a $1,000 college scholarship, the America's National official gold necklace and stickpin, and courses in dancing and modeling.

Mr. President, I know that the people of South Carolina join me in congratulating Miss Abel on this outstanding accomplishment, and we are proud to have a young lady of this caliber represent well our State and Nation as America's Young Miss 1982-83.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the July 1, 1982, edition of the Citizen-News newspaper appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the (Edgefield County) Citizen-News, July 1, 1982]

APRIL ABEL CROWNED YOUNG MISS AMERICA

On Saturday night, June 26, S.C. Young Miss April Abel was crowned America's Young Miss 1982-83. First runner-up was West Virginia Young Miss Cecelia Connors; 2nd runner-up was Georgia Young Miss Kendra Tomlinson and 4th runner-up was North Carolina Young Miss Leslie Ching.

April also received the Miss Congeniality Award and the Talent Award. She has had ten years instruction in dancing and performed a tap routine to "It Don't Mean a Thing."

When crowned America's Young Miss April received a $1,000 scholarship to the college of her choice, crown, robe, scepter, trophy, flowers, an 11"x14" portrait, a weekend beach vacation, the American's National official gold necklace and stick pin and a dance and modeling course.

April is the 15 year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. Ashley Abel of Johnston, and the granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ashley Abel of West Palm Beach, Florida, and the late Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Newman of Prosperity, S.C.

She is a rising sophomore at Strom Thurmond High School where she is a member of the concert band, a member of the student council and is Miss Freshman 1982. She is a member of Johnston United Methodist Church.

The American's National Pageant Production sponsored this the first American's Young Miss and America's Teen Miss Pageant June 24, 25, 26, in Sumter, S.C. Judging was based on the following: Evening Gown 25 percent, Swimsuit 25 percent, Judges Interview 25 percent and Talent 25 percent.

Florida's Teen Miss Dawn Michele Lewis was crowned America's Teen Miss. 1st runner-up was Georgia Teen Miss Dottie Jo Brown; 2nd runner-up was Virginia Teen Miss Julie Redmon; 3rd runner-up was North Carolina Teen Miss Sherri Hastins; and 4th runner-up was South Carolina Teen Miss Michelle Cox.

FARM POLICY ENDANGERED?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the programs announced by the Secretary of Agriculture and the actions taken by the Senate Agriculture Committee last week will go a long way to strengthen the farm economy. However, more stringent, costly measures being considered by the House of Representatives should be opposed.

On July 14, Secretary Block announced the 1983 wheat program and an increase in export credit financing. On July 16, the Senate Agriculture Committee adopted an amendment I proposed to encourage agricultural exports and provide cash flow assistance to farmers. According to the Congressional Budget Office, my amendment would expand exports, increase farm prices, and provide net savings to the taxpayer.

Now I understand that the House Agriculture Committee is considering even more stringent measures to deal with the farm economy. Members of the House are proposing legislation that would require a reduction of one-fourth in wheat acreage, pay farmers not to plant that acreage, and increase price supports at the same time.

While I share these Members' concern for the farm economy and I certainly recognize their right to pursue this legislation, I do not believe that their approach is necessary or even in the ultimate best interest of agriculture.

The House proposal would require U.S. farmers to reduce wheat acreage by 25 percent to qualify for program benefits, at the same time that foreign growers are expanding their production of the same crop. A 25-percent acreage reduction in the United States will only allow our competitors around the world to sell more grain at our expense.

Canada has urged its farmers to pursue all-out production. If Canadian farmers carry out their expressed planting intentions for 1982, they will have expanded acreage by 20 percent in 3 years. Argentina is reportedly considering bringing into cultivation a potential 20 to 25 million additional acres. Australia is expected to have record plantings of wheat this year.

In the June World Grain Situation and Outlook circular, the U.S. Department of Agriculture made estimates of the area to be harvested for 1982-83 crops. A comparison with area harvested for the 1981-82 crop demonstrates how other countries are expanding production so as to usurp traditional U.S. customers.

In Canada, the area harvested for wheat is projected to increase by 3 percent. In Argentina, the increase is 9 percent. In Australia, the increase is 5 percent. meanwhile, in the United States the area harvested is projected to decline by nearly 4 percent.

In the face of this expanded competition, the House proposal would place further restraints on American farmers while foreign growers produce more and sell more.

Are the supporters of this proposal tacitly suggesting to competitor nations that they should continue expanding their area planted to crops and eroding U.S. markets?

Is it the intent of the supporters of this proposal to return U.S. farm policies and programs to the days when U.S. farmers produced strictly for a domestic market?

Are they telling the European Community that the United States will cease its challenges to their excessive governmental subsidization of their agricultural production, and that we accept the negative impacts on our agricultural exports? I hope not.

Such action would be tantamount to a unilateral withdrawal by the United States from our share of world markets. These are markets which the American farmer cannot afford to lose.

Now, I recognize that there is a need for an acreage reduction program in the United States. In fact, the Secretary of Agriculture is already implementing one. But a paid diversion of the scale that has been suggested goes too far, and acreage reductions should be coupled with a strong export enhancement program to keep us competitive.

My amendment represents a balanced approach which includes incentives to participate in acreage reduction programs along with export enhancement provisions.

Under my amendment, farmers participating in USDA's voluntary acreage reduction programs would receive an advance portion of anticipated deficiency payments on 1982 and 1983 crops of wheat, feed grains, cotton, and rice.

It would provide eligible farmers 70 percent of estimated 1982 deficiency payments as soon as possible after October 1, 1982. Farmers would be able to receive up to 50 percent of the estimated 1982 deficiency payments at the time they sign up for an acreage reduction of set-aside program. The Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized to provide such advance payments for the 1984 and 1985 crops.

This should improve the cash flow situation for many economically stressed farmers and be an added incentive to restrain overproduction. It would not create new costs to the taxpayer, but in a case where the Government is going to make payments anyway, it will allow farmers to put the capital to more productive use.

Also, my amendment would instruct the Secretary of Agriculture to use at least $175 million but not more than $190 million of CCC funds to meet the unfair competitive practices of other countries so as to enhance American exports. These authorities could only be used in cases where sales of U.S. products are being lost due to the subsidies of another country.

I believe it is high time that we confront the unfair trade practices of the European Community head on. The EC has been subsidizing exports of European wheat, feed grains, sugar, broilers, and other products. In doing so, they displace American exports and depress American farm prices.

Now, President Reagan and Secretary Block have taken a firm stance against these practices of the EC, and I commend them for it. But the fact is that the EC has not stopped their unfair trade practices.

While no one in this country is asking for a trade war, the truth is that our markets have already been invaded. The EC is unfairly displacing our export markets through export subsidies, and it is time we gave them a dose of their own medicine.

Such action should counter the unfair practices of other countries, and encourage demand for U.S. farm products.

I am pleased that the Senate Agriculture Committee adopted my amendment. It incorporates features of bills which have been introduced by Senators COCHRAN and HUDDLESTON, Senator GRASSLEY, and Congressman HAGEDORN, so a great deal of credit should go to them.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the export promotion part of my amendment would produce significant savings. CBO assumes—rightly so, I am sure—that the administration would employ the most cost-effective means of stimulating exports. This would stimulate $500 million in additional exports in 1983, $450 million additional exports in 1984, and $400 million additional in 1985.

CBO assumes the additional exports to be 30 percent wheat, 30 percent corn, 15 percent soybeans, 10 percent cotton, 8 percent rice, and 7 percent other commodities. These expanded exports are projected to increase prices and result in commodity program savings of $291 million, $239 million, and $183 million in fiscal years 1983 through 1985, respectively.

In other words, my amendment is not only good for farmers and good for trade policy, it is also good for the taxpayers of America.

I might also note that the Secretary of Agriculture's announcements last week represented a positive response to the concerns of several Senate leaders.

On April 29, 1982, Senators BAKER, DOLE, COCHRAN, DOMENICI, and myself wrote to Secretary Block urging certain actions to aid the farm economy. We encouraged him to announce 1983 commodity programs as soon as possible and to implement the farm storage facility loan program.

Secretary Block announced the 1983 wheat program on July 14, more than a month prior to the statutory deadline. The National Association of Wheat Growers called it "likely the earliest wheat program announcement in history."

On the same day, the Secretary announced that USDA will resume approval of new applications for farm storage facility loans. Disbursement of $40 million in loans will begin after October 1, which will help farmers make storage plans for 1982 crops.

I am pleased by this positive response to both of the suggestions offered by this group of Senators.

In summary, a number of actions have already been taken to help farmers and encourage agricultural exports. More drastic measures such as a paid land diversion and increased price supports will move U.S. farmers out of markets, rather than into them. Such action should be opposed.

We must maintain and expand our share of world markets if American farmers are to receive real profits in the marketplace. Such profits are good for the agricultural economy and good for the Nation's economy as well.

ILLINOIS NATIONAL GUARD CONFERENCE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, earlier this year, I had the pleasure of attending the annual Illinois National Guard conference, held in Peoria. At the conference, I had the welcome opportunity to express my appreciation and admiration of the leaders of the Illinois National Guard for the vital contribution which they and their fellow guardsmen make to our national defense. Without a National Guard, we would have no hope of maintaining an All-Volunteer Force and would have to shoulder the extra burdens of a much larger standing Army.

At the conference, I advised the Illinois Guard of Senate Concurrent Resolution 52, introduced by Senator GARN and cosponsored by quite a number of Senators. I am especially gratified that the language of this resolution, expressing the sense of the Congress that the members of the National Guard deserve public recognition for their dedicated service and urging their civilian employers to grant them time off for military training exclusive of their earned vacation, has now been incorporated in S. 2248, the fiscal year 1983 defense authorization bill passed by the Senate in May.

Mr. President, to our sincere regret and sorrow, this year's conference took place in the shadow of a tragic crash the preceding week of an Illinois Air Guard KC-135 tanker from the 126th Air Refueling Wing based at O'Hare Airport. The accident, which killed 27 military personnel, including 4 Illinois guardsmen, was a terrible reminder of the dangers and risks confronted by our citizen-soldiers in performing their duties.

During my visit back home in Illinois that week, I called on the family of M. Sgt. Richard A. Chrome, the boom operator of the tanker, who perished in the crash and who was almost a neighbor in my hometown of Wilmette. As I told the audience at the conference, the painful and tragic reminder of this terrible accident must move us to redouble our efforts to provide the Reserve components with modern equipment. In particular, we must continue to fully support the JT-3D and CFM-56 re-engining programs for our aging KC-135 fleet.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions adopted at the conference, along with the remarks offered by two of the principal speakers, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

1. The National Guard Association of Illinois extends its deepest sympathy to the family, friends, and fellow guardsmen of those killed in the 19 March 1982 crash of the aircraft belonging to the 126th Air Refueling Wing.

2. The National Guard Association of Illinois goes on record in support of the Illinois National Guard Scholarship program to insure increased opportunities for all Illinois citizen soldiers.

3. In conjunction with the National Guard Association of the United States, the National Guard Association of Illinois supports the removal of the recently enacted federal pay cap as to the affect it has on the National Guard personnel.

4. The National Guard Association of Illinois supports the program for relocation and modernization of facilities to enhance the continuing programs of the Illinois National Guard.

5. The National Guard Association of Illinois supports the Army, Reserve Component/Active Component partnership and the Active Air Force Advisory Wing Program to increase continuity under the total force concept.

WELCOME BY LT. COL. ALDO ZORDAN, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF ILLINOIS

Ladies and gentlemen, I welcome you to the 13th Annual Banquet of the National Guard Association of Illinois. For many of you this has been a long day beginning with the senior NCO breakfast at 0700 continuing through the business session all day, and now finally the time for relaxation and enjoyment.

Following on those kind words from Chaplain Haddick, I know there is a deep sense of loss, regret and compassion that hangs over all of us tonight for those military members who died so tragically last weekend. Although only 4 of the 27 who perished were guardsmen, we are all on the same team. Many last minute cancellations were the result of funeral arrangements scheduled for this afternoon in different areas. Other guardsmen too, died suddenly during the past year although not so many at once. And yet . . . life continues . . . so let us remember and treasure the fond memories of our fallen comrades and enjoy the companionship of our fellow guardsmen gathered here together this evening. Our associations goals are to foster, promote and advance the well-being of the Illinois Guard . . . lets join and dedicate ourselves to these issues with renewed vigor.

SPEECH DELIVERED BY MAJ. GEN. LOUIS C. BUCKMAN, HQ SAC/DO

Thank you Lt. Col. Zordan, Senator Percy, Maj. Gen. Phipps, and Maj. Gen. Walker.

Ladies and gentlemen, Thank you for your invitation to join you here tonight at your annual conference. It is indeed a pleasure for me to address a group of individuals such as yourselves who—as evidenced by your membership in an association with the National Guard—are voluntarily concerned about the defense of our country. It is your spirit of patriotism and service that has been such an important factor in our proud history. I share with you the sorrow over the tragic loss last weekend of 27 dedicated Air Guard and Air Force Reserve personnel, also the needless loss of four Air Guard crewmembers in Arizona.

Tonight I would like to talk about where we are strategically in our country and in SAC today compared to the U.S.S.R; secondly about the President's program for strategic force modernization, and thirdly, how the National Guard and its ardent supporters fit into the picture. First: where do we stand today in the strategic balance between the United States and the Soviet Union? Actually, the word could be "strategic imbalance" vice strategic "balance." This is because today the reality of the Soviet threat looms larger than ever. It has been stated many times that: when we build, they build; when we stop building, they build. Let me put this into perspective for you.

Since the late 1960's, the Soviets have increased their active duty forces by almost 1 million people. Our forces are at their lowest total since 1950 . . .

The Soviets have a force today of 50,000 tanks; we have 11,000. They outnumber us by almost five to one. they have a total of 8,100 fighter aircraft; we have 4,560—almost a two to one advantage for the Soviets. In fiscal year 1982 the Air Force will purchase 207 aircraft. If we buy a roughly comparable number for the Navy, we come out at something less than 500 for the Nation. The Soviets will build 1,300 combat aircraft this year. Strategically, the Soviets boast the larger intercontinental ballistic missile force, almost 1,400 to our 1,052. Since the 1960's, the Soviets have increased their intercontinental nuclear delivery vehicles sixfold, our numbers remained static. I remind you that our latest ballistic missile and penetrating bombers are of the 1960 vintage.

The driving factor for the need to increase our defense expenditures resides in this growing Soviet threat, and their unrelenting emphasis on building an even stronger military force. By comparison, the Soviet percentage of gross national product devoted to defense shows that their appropriations for military expenditures are 50 percent higher than those of the United States when measured in dollars. The net result is that the Soviets spent 450 billion dollars more on defense over the last 10 years than we did—creating a shift in the nuclear balance of power.

With this somewhat gloomy strategic "imbalance" in mind, I would like to now turn to what we are doing about the situation: i.e., President Reagan's strategic modernization plan. His package is based upon national strength and is premised upon the idea that to survive, we must have the will and capability to meet the Soviet challenge head-on, capitalizing on the enemy's weaknesses while optimizing our own strengths.

Secretary of Defense Weinberger summarized our defense strategy very well when he said,

"We must be prepared to meet Soviet military power; however it might be used. We have to be stonger than we were before because the Soviets are stronger. Otherwise, we will not be able to deter the conflict we all want to avoid. And if deterrence does fail, we must be able to win and to survive."

The President's five point strategic modernization plan is aimed at being able to fully implement this strategy. His program includes:

(1) Improvements in command and control systems for our forces; (2) modernization of the strategic bomber force; (3) deployment of new submarine launched missiles; (4) the improvement of our land based missiles, as well as reducing their vulnerability; and (5) the restoration of our strategic defenses.

I would now like to briefly describe the five mutually reinforcing elements of the program. First, we will significantly upgrade our strategic communications and control systems that will lead to a more reliable capability to command and control our forces before, during, and after an exchange of nuclear weapons. Our goal is to make these communications and control systems as strong as the nuclear systems they support. This requires enhanced warning and attack assessment, mobile command centers that could survive an initial attack, and more survivable communication links.

Second, we will modernize the bomber force by procuring 100 B-1 bombers as soon as possible, and continue a vigorous advanced technology bomber program leading to deployment in the 1990's. Near-term capability will be enhanced through deployment of cruise missiles on our newer B-52's, B-52 electromagnetic pulse hardening, additional electronic countermeasures equipment for our B-52 force, and re-engining our KC-135 tankers. In addition, the procurement of up to 60 KC-10's has been proposed.

Third, we will proceed with a step-by-step ICBM modernization program by continuing MX missile research and development and deploying at least 100 MX missiles. In the near term, a limited number of these missiles have been proposed to be placed in existing ICBM silos. In addition, we will pursue an aggressive research and development effort on long term basing options for MX; deceptive basing, deep underground basing continuous patrol aircraft, and ballistic missile defense, to allow selection of the best candidate no later than 1984. Any of these basing options will increase the survivability of the land based missile force.

Fourth, we will continue to modernize the sea-based force and make it more capable. We will develop the larger and more accurate Trident II D-5 missile and will deploy it starting in 1989. Also we will continue to produce Trident submarines at a steady rate of one per year. In addition, we will commence early deployment of nuclear-armed, sea-launched cruise missiles on general purpose submarines.

Finally, we will increase funding for strategic defensive systems including upgrading of surveillance and warning systems, limited air defense, and the ballistic missile defense mentioned previously.

Presently there is much debate on the cost of the President's proposed defense program. This is as it should be since it involves large dollars in the national budget. However, I would like to make the following points. Defense takes approximately 6 percent of the gross national product while social programs consume approximately 12 percent. The rate of real growth in defense in the last 15 years has been 1.1 percent while medicare rose 22.1 percent, social security 6.7 percent, higher education 9.1 percent and housing assistance 18.8 percent. This year we Americans will spend as much money for soft drinks as we will buying aircraft and missiles for the U.S. Air Force—about $18 billion. The price of freedom is high but we can and must expend the necessary national assets.

How do you guardsmen and Guard supporters fit into the picture? First, you view real and vital augmentation to the Army and Air Force active forces as well as navy support. Your involvement with the Strategic Air Command insures that we can meet our worldwide refueling commitments in peacetime and wartime. Today's environment requires that we be capable of force projection anywhere anytime. This takes tankers to not only get the bombers and fighters there but also to support the required massive troop and cargo movements. Our C-141s and C-5s need the longer "legs" that come from inflight refueling just as much as our B-52's and F-4's.

While the Air Force is getting newer, more fuel efficient aircraft, our refueling requirements are increasing. Because of an ever increasing competition for our tanker resources the 126 ARW at O'Hare International Airport and the 12 Air National Guard tanker units are needed more and more. Also to help meet this demand we are getting more KC-10's into the inventory with the Air Force Reserve providing the usual professional aircrews.

Perhaps an equally important way you can contribute to a strong national defense is you vocal support of the President's defense programs, point out to your neighbors and elected officials the need to meet the Soviet challenge and the consequences of not meeting it. As Sir John Slessor observed, "It is customary in democratic countries to deplore expenditures on armaments as conflicting with the requirements of the social services. There is a tendency to forget that the most important social service a government can do for its people is to keep them alive and free."

Finally, I would be remiss if I did not mention an aspect of our readiness which is interwoven throughout all that we have discussed here tonight—and that is people. Only people—professionally trained, highly motivated, and personally dedicated—can transform rhetoric into capabilities.

We in the Strategic Air Command demand much of our people in terms of absolute dedication and near perfection in those aspects of their jobs involving our mission. I think this type of discipline works—and works well. I am proud of the people in SAC—they are a first-class team of professionals and I am proud that the National Guard is a vital part of that team.

The Soviets may be able to close the gap in weapons production and to narrow the gap in military technology, but they will never come close to the spirit, the dedication, and the initiative of the men and women in the Armed Forces of the United States.

You in the National Guard typify this most important asset of ours: dedicated people with spirit and initiative prepared and willing to voluntarily meet the challenges that lie ahead. It is a distinct privilege to be here with you tonight. Thank you.

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this week we in the United States join in the 24th observance of captive nations Week. At this time of special remembrance of captive nations, we demonstrate our solidarity with all those who endure continued captivity under communism. More important, we rededicate ourselves to their legitimate aspirations for independence and freedom.

THE FEDERAL GAS TAX

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would like to bring to my colleague's attention an editorial that appeared in the Chicago Sun-Times several months ago which is particularly relevant to today's debate on the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (H.R. 4961). The article discusses the many advantages of increasing the current 4 cents-per-gallon tax on gasoline which has not been raised since 1959.

First, a gasoline tax could help reduce our gasoline consumption and, thereby, our oil imports, cutting significantly our annual foreign oil bill of $76 billion and our vulnerability to unforseen disruptions in the Middle East. Second, it could provide immediate revenues to help reduce our soaring Federal deficit. Finally, it could help our Nation's highways and mass transit systems from falling further in disrepair. The merits of such a tax, as outlined by this article, are certainly worth more careful consideration by the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask that the following article from the Chicago Sun-Times, dated February 28, 1982, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sun-Times, Feb. 28, 1982]

RAISE THE FEDERAL GAS TAX

The worldwide oil glut is forcing OPEC and other petroleum producers to cut their prices. Gasoline prices are dropping, too. After nine rough years of steadily rising fuel costs, that's good news, right? Not entirely.

Reagan administration officials say oil supplies are up primarily because recessions here and abroad have cut demand—less because of conservation and energy efficiency. When the slump ends, renewed industrial and individual demands will soak up the glut.

We wish that analysis were wrong. By now, Americans should be well into a new era of conservation awareness that would outlast the recession. But apparently we are not. Lower gasoline costs seem to be reviving consumers' interest in big cars at the expense of conservation.

Auto dealers and others say that new-car buyers are stressing dependability over fuel economy. That's a worrisome shift. Two years ago 33 percent of car buyers listed fuel economy as their top concern. Fewer than half of those still rank economy first.

What foolishness. Such lack of concern will only strengthen OPEC's hand again and skyrocket all energy prices to new levels.

Although big cars do get better mileage than they once did, full-size models still gulp more fuel—especially in city driving—than their smaller brethren. But there is a way to limit our myopic love affair with big cars:

Raise the federal gasoline tax.

That levy has been stuck at 4 cents a gallon since 1959. An increase of 4 or 5 cents a gallon, once urged by Transportation Secretary Drew Lewis, would generate billions for highway repair and mass transit, and possibly help reduce soaring federal deficits.

And it would remind motorists of an essential fact: Fuel misers can still help ease our dependence on foreign oil barons.

THE MACHINE TOOL INDUSTRY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, I have been concerned for some time about the ability of our defense base to respond in the event of a national emergency. Of particular concern is the American machine tool industry, whose capacity to respond is being sharply eroded by an alarming jump in imported equipment.

The Joint Economic Committee, of which I am vice chairman, has held extensive hearings on the impact of imports on our defense base. Based upon the record of these hearings, I am prepared to introduce, at the appropriate time, measures which will maintain our defense industrial base—and, most particularly, our domestic machine tool industry—in the face of further deterioration caused by imports.

Last year, 36 percent of the machine tools installed by American industry came from overseas; 30 percent of the machine tool dollars spent by American industry went for imports. This compares to a 7-percent market share 10 years ago and a 12-percent market share just 5 years ago.

One out of every seven dollars spent by American industry in 1981 for machine tools went to Japan. The Japanese penetration of the American machine tool market increased annually on a geometric basis from 1976 to 1979. Since that time, it has increased by about 50 percent each year. Japan has concentrated its machine tool exports to the United States on those product lines which are the most critical to our defense needs.

How did all of this occur? To be sure, there are many factors, one of the most important of which is the encouragement of the Japanese machine tool industry's export activities by the Japanese Government. The industry has been directly and indirectly subsidized, and the Government has also countenanced, if not encouraged, the formation of a cartel for the purpose of invading the American machine tool market.

Recently, Houdaille Industries Inc., of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., filed a petition under title 26, United States Code, section 48(a)(8)(D), to make certain classes of Japanese machine tools ineligible for the investment tax credit because of alleged unfair trade practices. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the summary of the Houdaille petition be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF HOUDAILLE PETITION

INTRODUCTION

Houdaille Industries Inc., has petitioned the President of the United States to exercise discretion afforded to him under 26 U.S.C. § 48(a)(8)(D) to make Japanese manufactured numerical controlled machining centers and numerical controlled punching machines ineligible for the investment tax credit (ITC). In order for this section to be invoked it need only be shown that Japan maintains nontrade barriers which substantially burden U.S. trade in a manner inconsistent with trade agreements, or that it engages in discriminatory acts or policies restricting trade including tolerance of international cartels.

SUMMARY

The Houdaille petition documents an array of Japanese Government policies and practices which have created, assisted and protected an alleged Japanese machine tool industry cartel. It traces the manner by which MITI organized and concentrated the Japanese machine tool industry by creating market allocations, fostering price fixing, and providing immunization from Japan's antimonopoly laws. It also details the many types of special financial assistance which have been provided to the Japanese machine tool industry.

OUTLINE

JAPANESE MACHINE TOOL CARTEL

A. Definition of cartel.—"a combination of independent commercial enterprises designed to limit competition."

B. Organization of cartel.—Extraordinary Measures Law for Promotion of Machinery Industry (1956) ordered MITI to organize and rationalize the machinery industry by issuing instructions for concerted actions involving production quotas, joint purchasing combines, restrictions on product manufacturing, etc.

Japanese companies were granted immunity from the Antimonopoly Law and their actions have been ignored by the Fair Trade Commission.

Goals of the EML (cartel) are to: Modernize and increase manufacturing capacity; centralize and concentrate manufacture of product lines in order to improve quality and performance and to reduce costs through specialization; standardize parts and purchasing methods; and establish collaborative research institutions.

C. Supervision and operation of cartel.—Machinery Industry Council was established within MITI.

MITI issues directives for Japanese companies regarding performance, quality, and cost objectives by machinery category.

MITI issues directives regarding the acquisition of new facilities, retirement of old facilities, utilization of manufacturing technology, etc. even to the extent of specifying the precise machines to be acquired or disposed of.

MITI may bar companies from manufacturing specific products.

MITI arranges concentrated manufacturing agreements among Japanese companies to: Determine appropriate sizes for companies; "rationalize" managements; establish orderly allocation of total industry production by machine type; arrange exchange of equipment and technology among companies; approve manufacture of new products; and set specific industry production goals by product type.

MITI directs development and production of NC machine tools including production targets and sponsors an agreement for the orderly export of NC lathes and NC machining centers to the United States including determination of prices to be charged.

MITI supervises and fosters machinery industry relationships with companies in related industries such as control manufacturers, robot and tool manufacturers, etc.

MITI directs organization of overseas sales and service organizations.

MITI establishes and maintains common data banks for the industry.

MITI fosters industry efforts to collectively fix and determine prices on exports to the United States.

MITI encourages joint production, marketing, research and export efforts.

MITI standardizes customer terms and conditions for the industry to avoid competition over terms.

MITI arranges mergers of companies to foster centralization of production and economies of scale.

MITI determines which companies will perform research and which companies will receive the results of research and prevents duplication of research efforts.

II. FINANCIAL SUPPORT AND INCENTIVES

A. Tax benefits.—Deductions for bad debt reserves are allowed at 20–100 times actual losses experienced specifically for the machine tool industry.

New equipment can be depreciated to the extent of ½ to ⅔ of cost in the year of acquisition.

Companies receive a tax credit equal to 10 percent of the cost of equipment scrapped.

Companies receive a 20 percent R. & D. tax credit on incremental R. & D. even if government funded.

Japanese machine tool companies are allowed deductions to create a number of other reserves which are not good deductions in the United States.

B. Concessionary loans.—Loans at low or no interest are available to the machine tool industry for its own use.

Similar loans are available to machine tool companies to finance customer purchases.

Loans made for R. & D. are forgiven if the R. & D. is unsuccessful.

C. Grants.—Grants are made to the machine tool industry by the Japan Research Development Corp. and the Agency for Industrial Science and Technology.

D. Other financial assistance.—A portion of the proceeds from motorcycle and bicycle races is funneled to the machine tool industry.

Control of sugar imports was given to the machine tool industry from the early 1950's to the mid 1960's generating enormous capital for the industry.

APPENDIX

CHRONOLOGY OF LAWS, DIRECTIVES, AND REGULATIONS

1952 Export and Import Trading Law (EITL).—The purpose of the EITL is to establish orderly export and import trade and allows persons qualified by the EITL to engage in certain types of concerted activities (cartels) in connection with items to be exported.

1956 Extraordinary Measures Law for Promotion of Machinery Industry (1st EML).—The purpose of EML was to establish by law the authority of MITI to guide and plan the future of the machinery industry.

Cabinet Order No. 238.—An enforcement order identifying the specific machinery which the 1st EML is to cover.

MITI Ordinance No. 63.—Basically the first of a series of "regulations" issued as a result of any EML's legislated which cover production volumes, methods, capacity, financing, etc.

1957 MITI Ordinance No. 112.—Supplements Ordinance No. 63.

1960 Agreement Regarding Concentrated Manufacturing (ARCM).—An Agreement among machine tool manufacturers which basically reiterates the directives of MITI with respect to allocation of markets by product, size and management of companies, production methods, etc. This was periodically amended to provide for updating new production levels, technology, market changes, etc.

1968 MITI Ordnance No. 304 and 305.—Supplements No. 63.

1971 Standard Regarding Notifications of New Products (Standard).—This superseded the ACRM of 1960 but intended to preserve the same anti-competitive arrangement in a new, more subtle guise.

Extraordinary Measures Law for Promotion of Specific Electronic Industries and Specific Machinery Industries (2nd EML).—This law brought certain electronic manufacturers under the auspices of MITI heretofore not covered, and reaffirmed the protection and aid which would be afforded the machine tool industry.

Cabinet Order No. 197.—An enforcement order identifying industrial production to be covered by the 2nd EML and the method by which it would be fostered.

MITI Ordinance No. 346.—Supplements No. 63.

1978 Extraordinary Measures Law for Promotion of Specific Machinery and Information Industries (3rd EML).—Twenty-two years after passage of the 1st EML Japan continues to consider the MT industry as a "start-up" fledgling business which requires certain protections as such. This law also brought under its auspices the growing software industry which augments its NC and CNC equipment.

Cabinet Order No. 342.—Enforcement order for 3rd EML.

MITI Ordinance 608, 609, 614, 615.—Supplements Ordinance No. 63.

Mr. JEPSEN. The net effect of all this—regardless of who is to blame—has serious implications for the national defense of the United States. Machine tools are one of the most essential components of the defense industrial base. Not one plane can be made, not one missile produced without hundreds and thousands of intricate machine tools. Once we lose the domestic capability to build a given specialized machine tool, it could take as long as 18 months to restore that capability. It would take even longer before those newly produced machine tools could be used to produce the weapons we would need in the event of national emergency.

The national defense implications of weakness or deterioration in this sector are self-evident. We are already foreign-source dependent on a majority of materials that are critical to defense production requirements. To overcome this situation, a national stockpile of strategic and critical materials is maintained. There is no such stockpile of machine tools to insure that available production capacity during an emergency, nor is one proposed, since machines would lose their usefulness if maintained in long-term storage.

I am looking at many alternatives to insure that we maintain the necessary base of machine tool producers in this country. If the tax bill now before us were being considered under rules permitting a broader division of tax policy, I might consider offering an amendment denying the 10-percent investment tax credit to foreign machine tools. Using 1981 import figures, this amendment, if enacted, would increase revenues by up to $143 million annually—10 percent of the 1981 machine tool import figures of $1.43 billion. It would also give our domestic machine tool industry important import relief in its times of troubles. Most important, it would help preserve an industry which is critical to our Nation's industrial base. Machine tools are the foundation of our entire industrial economy and—most critically—to the creation of modern armaments. Mr. President, given the very tight germaneness rules under which we are considering this reconciliation tax bill, I will defer consideration of any such amendment until another time. However, I did want to call my colleagues' attention to the serious problems posed to our Nation's security by the recent quantum jump in the import penetration of foreign machine tools.

LAND REMOTE SENSING SATELLITE AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1982

● Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, last Friday, NASA successfully launched an Earth remote sensing satellite known as Landsat D. Landsat D is the fourth satellite launched by the United States for the purpose of sensing the Earth's natural and environmental resources. The first such satellite was launched in 1972, and in the intervening decade, much has been learned about the benefits of this space technology. I would like to congratulate the fine Government/industry teams that accomplished this challenging undertaking.

NASA has played the critical R. & D. role in developing these satellites. Beyond R. & D., however, the continuing role of the Federal Government in an operational remote sensing system has been the subject of much wheel spinning.

Successive administrations have struggled with the question of what is the appropriate role of Government and the private sector in the remote sensing area. Both the Carter and the Reagan administrations established the goal that the private sector would take over the Landsat system. The key question, is, however, how soon and under what terms would this transition occur?

The present administration has been considering how to transition Landsat to the private sector, but no viable proposal has surfaced. The latest pronouncement by President Reagan in his national space policy address on July 4 contained nothing new.

Last year, I suggested an approach that one could pursue to meet the goal of transferring the Landsat system to the private sector and at the same time protect U.S. public interests. This year, at a hearing before the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, Dr. John W. Townsend, Jr., testified and presented a very similar approach. Today, I am introducing a bill based on this approach, the Land Remote Sensing Satellite Authorization Act of 1982, with Senators RIEGLE and FORD as cosponsors.

I am introducing this legislation because we currently face a policy stalemate regarding Landsat. Our lack of attention and action is not in the United States best interest. Only our competition, in this case our international trading partners, benefit from our policy impasse. This is a key conclusion of a recently issued report by the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, on which I serve as a member of the OTA Board.

In a major study entitled, "Civilian Space Policy and Applications," the OTA candidly points out the challenge we face. They state:

International competition in space applications is a reality. The Europeans and the Japanese have targeted specific space technologies for development and they will soon be providing stiff competition for services heretofore offered only by the United States . . . unless the United States is prepared to commit more of its public and private resources to space than it now does, it will lose its preeminence in space applications during the 1980s. Both technological and commercial leadership are at stake. The U.S. leadership position will depend not only, or even primarily, on spending more money, but on effectively allocating our technical, financial, and institutional resources to meet international competition.

Specifically referring to Landsat, the OTA report indicates that:

The future of U.S. civilian satellite land remote sensing is in considerable doubt. The question of what to do with the system is a critical one for the future of the management and development of U.S. natural resources. Whatever is decided, the question should be resolved with dispatch.

The report also states:

One promising means of effecting transfer to the private sector would be to commercialize the space and ground segments at different rates. The ground segment already has a strong private component; the small but important value-added industry, which processes and enhances satellite data to meet particular user needs, is certainly growing, if not yet flourishing. The remainder of the ground segment, the receiving and processing centers, could be operated by the private sector provided continuity of dataflow from the space segment were assured. In the next 5 to 10 years, the market is not likely to sustain commercial operation of the entire satellite land remote sensing system without substantial direct or indirect Government fundings.

The bill I am introducing follows this phased-in approach toward commercialization. It recognizes that a value-added and information processing industry already exists. The basic data handling is currently run by the Government, but much of it in fact is contractor operated. This portion of the Landsat system could be transitioned to the private sector on a competitive basis. Under this legislation, the space segment would continue to be the responsibility of the Federal Government until such time as it can be evolved on a competitive basis. Thus, the Government would provide data continuity essential to building the Landsat market.

I hope this legislation will help focus the discussion and develop a consensus on how to proceed to protect this valuable U.S. resource. By inaction, we only fritter away the lead built up by our scientists and engineers and funded by U.S. taxpayers. I do not find that an acceptable course of action. Mr. President, I hope the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation will hold hearings on this legislation so that we might have a chance to resolve this matter in the remaining days of the 97th Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2767

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Land Remote Sensing Satellite Authorization Act of 1982.".

FINDINGS, PURPOSE, AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) remote sensing from satellites can assist the rational management of the Earth's natural resources and environment by providing data on the geological, biological, hydrological, agricultural and other natural features of the Earth's surface;

(2) the United States is the world leader in developing land remote sensing technology through the experimental Landsat program;

(3) remote sensing data from satellites has been valuable and useful and is expected to be in greater demand in the future if it is available on a continuous, timely and reliable basis;

(4) the Federal Government should, for the near future, continue to be responsible for the space segment of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite systems, so that the market for data from such a system will become more mature; and

(5) the private sector has the technical ability and financial resources to own and operate the data-handling segment of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system and, therefore, authority to transfer the data-handling segment to the private sector should be provided.

(b) PURPOSES.—It is declared to be the purposes of the Congress in this Act that—

(1) the Secretary of Commerce shall be responsible for the operation of the space segment of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system, with authority to lease or contract such operation to the private sector;

(2) the Secretary of Commerce shall establish a process for transferring the data-handling segment of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system to the private sector and shall transfer such segment, if the Secretary determines such transfer to be feasible and cost effective; and

(3) any United States land remote sensing satellite system shall be operated in a manner consistent with international obligations of the United States.

(c) POLICY.—It is declared to be the policy of the Congress in this Act that—

(1) the United States should take steps to ensure, on a non-discriminatory basis, dissemination of data from any United States land remote sensing satellite system;

(2) all nations have the right to acquire data from space systems in outer space and to disseminate that data widely; and

(3) space technology developed by United States Government programs should be transferred to the private sector whenever feasible and cost-effective.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the term—

(1) "data" means a set of signals received by sensors on a satellite that are useful in describing or viewing the Earth's resources, features or environment;

(2) "data-handling segment" means that portion of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system that receives, processes, stores and manages data transmitted from a satellite, including the aggregation or processing of such data into usable information, except that such term does not include the space segment, as defined in paragraph (4) of this section;

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

(4) "space segment" means that portion of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system associated with satellite operation and control, and includes the satellite, its sensors, and associated equipment and facilities for tracking, guidance, and command purposes, except that such term does not include the data-handling segment, as defined in paragraph (2) of this section; and

(5) "United States land remote sensing satellite system" means a system of one or more satellites operating in outer space, the purpose of which is to obtain data on the geological, biological, hydrological, agricultural, and other natural features of the Earth's surface, and includes the space segment and data-handling segment, except that the term does not include any satellite which is intended for (A) national security uses; (B) commercial telecommunications; (C) weather observation and forecasting; or (D) research and development.

(b) OVERSEEING THE SYSTEM.—(1) The Secretary shall acquire from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration all portions of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system, except for those portions which are devoted solely to research and development. Data from any research and development portion should be made available as soon as possible for the purposes of this Act.

(2) The Secretary shall prepare a comprehensive overall plan, with periodic amendments as necessary, for the operation of the existing United States land remote sensing satellite system, including—

(A) procuring or acquiring launch services;

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space, and as a Senator from a State which has been involved in Landsat from the beginning, I would like to express my support for the Land Remote Sensing Satellite Authorization Act introduced today by Senator HOWARD W. CANNON. I believe that this bill proposes a reasonable and viable approach to transitioning the Landsat system to the private sector in that it retains Federal responsibility for the space segment of the system until the market for data becomes more mature, while authorizing the transfer of the data handling segment to the private sector. In establishing a process whereby Landsat is eventually evolved into the private sector, the bill accomplishes such important goals as insuring the continuity of data for Landsat users and maintaining our position as the world leader in remote sensing technology.

The highly successful operation of the experimental satellites Landsat 1, 2, and 3 has demonstrated the value of remotely sensed data to the management of the Earth's resources and environment. Remote sensing from satellites provides fundamental data on the geological, biological, hydrological, and agricultural features of the Earth's surface. This data has been utilized in such areas as management of agricultural resources, the location of mineral and energy deposits, land use, flood control, and pollution control.

However, it is extremely important to note that we will not be able to reap these benefits in the long term unless the necessary data is available on a continuing basis. This continuity will be provided by Landsat D, which was successfully launched on July 16, and the followup satellite Landsat D.

I would also like to point out that one very important factor in the use and demonstration of the value of remote sensing data has been the excellent work done by the Environmental Research Institute of Michigan (ERIM). This not-for-profit corporation has been involved with Landsat development from the start, in engineering and research as well as finding new uses for Landsat products. The significant contributions which ERIM scientists have made to the development of the Landsat system include essential refinements to the multispectral scanner, high resolution radars, laser scanners, and advanced processing systems. Finally, the Applications Division of ERIM, which has been joined by the Bendix Earth Resources & Data Center, gives ERIM what is considered to be the largest nongovernment processing facility in the world. We in Michigan are very proud of these accomplishments and look forward to further successes from ERIM.

ERIM has also played a significant role in maintaining the U.S. position of preeminence in the area of remote sensing—a position which will be seriously challenged when France launches its SPOT system in 1984. Unless we take firm steps to resolve the various policy questions about the U.S. role in operational remote sensing systems, we will be ill-equipped to meet this challenge and consequently will stand to lose our leadership position. I believe that this bill marks an important beginning in this process and will eventually lead to the successful resolution of this issue.●

By Mr. SYMMS:

S. 2769. A bill to amend the National Trails System Act by designating the Pacific Northwest Scenic Trail, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

DESIGNATION OF PACIFIC NORTHWEST SCENIC TRAIL

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to designate the Pacific Northwest Trail as a part of the National Trail System. The legislation would recognize this 1,200-mile backpacking trail extending from Olympic National Park in Washington to Glacier National Park, Mont.

The present route consists of pieced-together parts of old trails, country roads, stock driveways, and logging roads. The trail is endowed with some of the most spectacular scenery and hiking territory in the country. It links a variety of Northwest country traversing mountain ranges and lakes, desert-like lowlands, rainforest, alpine areas, and beaches. It is the perfect retreat for countless Americans seeking temporary escape from their busy lives.

Since the late 1960's the number of backpackers in this country has been growing at a tremendous rate. Today there are literally millions of Americans who participate in backpacking each year. It is apparent that backpacking is no short-lived fad but a resurgence of the traditional American love for the outdoors, Backpacking is widely recognized as one of the least expensive and most satisfying forms of recreation, Unfortunately, this new found popularity has often led to overcrowding of campsites and trails.

The Pacific Northwest Trail would be a perfect trail to help ease the overburdened National Trails System. The 1,200-mile trail would offer hikers literally hundreds of places where they could start their hiking trips, and its length would accommodate hikes varing from a single day to excursions several days long, or even a month's worth of hiking.

Hikers on this remarkable trail are not only treated to the great Northwest's beauty, but to its history as well. The Indian past survives in the legends of the Kettle Range's white mountains, and in the perfectly preserved 500-year-old village which archeologists are uncovering at Cape Alava. The pioneer period confronts and fascinates backpackers in the form of log cabins in old clearings, and the recollections of oldtimers that live along the trail. Whidbey Island can even boast an authentic blockhouse. All across the Northwest there are interesting traces of early travelers—explorers, such as Ross and Thompson; and forgotten trappers, homesteaders, miners, and foresters. To walk the trail is to learn American history firsthand—it is a very personal experience that will not easily be forgotten.

The designation of the Pacific Northwest Trail will also have a beneficial economic impact upon our region. Income will accrue to local merchants from outfitters, trail crews, and the many visitors that will need campgrounds and motel accommodations. In a region where so many enterprises have risen and fallen over the years, trail-based recreation can offer a modest yet firm boost to local economies.

Public support for the trail has been overwhelming. Last February, the Washington State Legislature passed unanimously a resolution urging President Reagan and the U.S. Congress to include the Pacific Northwest Trail in the National Trail System. I would like to ask unanimous consent to include a copy of the Washington State Resolution at the end of my statement.

Volunteerism is a major theme of this administration, and to go along with this theme the Pacific Northwest Trail is to be developed and maintained by local volunteers. The bill asks for no appropriations of any kind, nor does it provide powers of condemnation or Federal purchase of land.

The bill calls for the official inclusion of the trail in the National Trails System. The people of Idaho, Montana, and Washington want the trail. They have even organized themselves to mark and maintain the trail without financial reward. They are not asking for powers of condemnation to blaze their trail, since, for all practical purposes the trail already exists.

The State of Washington has by unanimous consent shown to us that they are willing to support the trail, and have urged its formal recognition. I urge the adoption of this legislation, which, in keeping with the purposes of the National Trails System Act, will provide for the ever-increasing outdoor recreation needs of an expanding population, and will promote public access to travel within, and enjoyment and appreciation of the open-air outdoor areas of the Nation.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 1981-45

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest Trail is one of several interstate wilderness trails in the United States; and

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest region is abundantly blessed with natural beauty, especially in its mountains and forests; and

Whereas, The enjoyment of the region's natural environment through involvement in outdoor recreational activities is an important part of the lives of many of the residents of the state of Washington; and

Whereas, The establishment and maintenance of trails is essential to provide access to wilderness areas; and

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest Trail offers a unique opportunity to experience the variety of nature in the Pacific Northwest region by linking this state's natural areas with those of neighboring states: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Senate of the State of Washington, That the administration and Congress are urged to recognize the valuable contribution to outdoor recreational activity made by the Pacific Northwest Trail by including it within the national trail system; and

Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Ronald Reagan, President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and each member of Congress from the State of Washington.

HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 82-116

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest Trail is one of several interstate wilderness trails in the United States; and

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest region is abundantly blessed with natural beauty, especially in its mountains and forests; and

Whereas, The enjoyment of the region's natural environment through involvement in outdoor recreational activities is an important part of the lives of many of the residents of the state of Washington; and

Whereas, The establishment and maintenance of trails is essential to provide access to wilderness areas; and

Whereas, The Pacific Northwest Trail offers a unique opportunity to experience the variety of nature in the Pacific Northwest region by linking this state's natural areas with those of neighboring states;

Now therefore, be it resolved, By the House of Representatives of the state of Washington, That the administration and Congress are urged to recognize the valuable contribution to outdoor recreational activity made by the Pacific Northwest Trail by including it within the national trail system; and

Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Ronald Reagan, President of the United States; the Secretary of the Interior; the President of the United States Senate; the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and each member of Congress from the state of Washington.

Adopted February 11, 1982.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

Senate Joint Resolution 216. Joint resolution prohibiting the Secretary of the Interior from implementing the 5-year Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas leasing plan until the Secretary has taken certain actions to conform the plan to the purposes and requirements of applicable law; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

LEGISLATION PROHIBITING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF LEASING PLAN

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to block the 5-year Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas leasing plan approved by Secretary of Interior, James Watt, yesterday. Congressman MARKEY and Congressman STUDDS are introducing today similar legislation in the House of Representatives.

I am compelled to take this action because I believe that the plan Secretary Watt has approved seriously threatens the Nation's fragile coastal areas, our marine environment and the fishing industry and other industries which depend on these resources. Offshore energy development is an important national objective and one that I fully support. But we can develop these resources in an orderly fashion without recklessly jeopardizing the environment.

In my view, the plan approved yesterday effectively violates key provisions of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments of 1978 and the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 as amended. Those provisions are designed to insure that energy development is performed with the necessary environmental protections and they require that Federal leasing activities are consistent with State coastal zone programs. The Watt plan runs roughshod over these congressional mandates and chooses instead an irresponsible process that will pit the Federal Government against the States, environmental groups and the fishing industry. Ironically, this contentious process will result in endless litigation and delays, distorting what should be and what could be an orderly process of energy development.

The joint resolution introduced today will require that the Secretary of Interior rewrite the 5-year plan to conform to the laws now on the books. Perhaps then we can develop our offshore resources as Congress intended—safely, with respect and care for our irreplaceable and priceless coastlines and marine environment.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON A BALANCED BUDGET

AMEDMENT NO. 1985

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. TSONGAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 58) proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal fiscal decisionmaking procedures.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute to Senate Joint Resolution 58 because I think we can move more quickly and effectively to balance the Federal budget. My amendment is not a constitutional amendment. I believe it will bring about lower deficits more rapidly than a constitutional amendment. I also believe it will result in an improved budgetary process. Rather than mandating a simplistic rule of budgetary behavior, it will focus our attention directly on the difficult budgetary choices to be made.

Simply, the amendment has two basic provisions:

First, it calls upon the President to submit a balanced budget 6 short months from now in January for fiscal year 1984.

Second, it distinguishes operating expenditures from capital expenditure so that the impact of deficit spending might be more appropriately evaluated.

RATIONALE FOR REQUESTING BALANCED FISCAL YEAR 1984 PRESIDENTIAL BUDGET

My basic objection to Senate Joint Resolution 58 as it now stands was aptly summed up in a Washington Post editorial:

It is grotesque for Senators and a President who cannot get their deficits under a $100 billion to support, piously, Constitutional language putting it at zero.

It is my colleague and friend, Senator MATHIAS, who said:

I do not think we should use the Constitution as a figleaf to cover our embarrassment over that deficit.

I concur with that sentiment wholeheartedly. Voting for the balance-the-budget amendment answers none of the difficult questions that so perplexed this body a few short weeks ago when it voted for a budget resolution with deficits of over $115 billion. This amendment will constrain none of the budget choices to be made in this Chamber until long past 1984. That is a couple of elections away. From a politician's perspective, an election away is as good as forever. Two elections away is the stuff dreams are made of. We can use the constitutional amendment to advertise our commitment to fiscal restraint without making any of the tough choices. I do not believe the Constitution is the proper place for such advertising.

This amendment is offered by individuals who I know are genuinely committed to the concept of a balanced Federal budget. They see this amendment and the delays in a balanced budget inherent in it as a last resort after all else has failed. They would prefer not to wait until halfway through the 1980's to achieve a goal they have struggled for over the past decade. They have tried everything else they say; a constitutional amendment is all that is left.

I do not agree. Why do we have to wait for 2 fiscal years after all the States ratify this provision to achieve a balanced budget? I am not willing to wait—the cost to the economy is too great. Our economy needs strong medicine and needs it fast. The unemployment rate stands at 9.5 percent. Over 10 million people are out of work, looking hopelessly for employment in an economy that lies listlessly dead in the water. Interest rates remain stubbornly high, and as they do the number of corporate and personal bankruptcies mount. Every 5 minutes of every business day, another business goes bankrupt. My amendment calls upon the President to submit a balanced budget in January for fiscal year 1984. That is 6 months away; we need wait no longer. I favor a 6-month wait over an indefinite number of years. With this amendment we can create a budget process that bears fruit quickly. We can have figs rather than mere figleafs.

This amendment has a second advantage that neither the constitutional amendment or the statutory substitutes offered so far enjoy—it is enforceable.

No one could litigate over a breach of a constitutional balanced budget amendment; no Congress could take a prior one to court for failing to abide by a statutory requirement. But each year, the President must offer a budget, and should he or she fail to do so, any Member of Congress can call upon the power of the courts to compel him or her to do so.

Some may say, that this provision does not guarantee a balanced budget because Congress may change the President's budget. If we do so, we face the greatest political arbiter of them all—public opinion. Each of us will face the polls and try to explain our failure to give the President what he or she asked for, and what the law calls for—a balanced budget. As has been pointed out, we are all in violation of the law now—we are required to balance the budget by the statute my colleague, Senator BYRD, introduced. What is currently lacking is a method to enforce that law and make it function. I believe my amendment will do just that.

RATIONALE FOR DISTINGUISHING CAPITAL EXPENDITURES FROM OPERATING OUTLAYS

In the President's own words, this amendment calls upon the Federal Government "to do what each of us does with our own family budget—spend no more than we can afford." He appeals to the basic logic that you simply cannot afford to continue to spend more than you bring in.

I believe the President's elixir sounds appealing, but can offer bad medicine for a family, business, or government. What if families had no access to borrowing? They could not borrow to buy a car, or a home, or to send their children to school. They would have to forgo all of the benefits such investments could make to their future standard of living. Prohibiting such borrowings makes no economic sense. As long as a family enjoys a sufficient and reliable source of future income with which to cover the expense of borrowings, it is irrational to prohibit it.

It has been argued that the balanced budget amendment will cause the Federal Government to do no more than State governments already do. Thirty-nine States are cited as having constitutional provisions limiting their ability to incur budget deficits. An additional eight States have similar statutory constraints. A listing of all State limitations is included as table V of the committee report. Fortunately, for virtually all of these States, provisions remain to allow the State to borrow to cover its expenditures for capital assets such as roads, schools, and utilities.

A description of the mechanisms used by States to finance capital assets without violating their constitutional and statutory covenants is included in attachment 1.

Attachments 2 and 3 show that the average State debt burden as a percentage of general expenditures is over 9 percent.

Wisely, States have learned the painful lessons of the pay-as-you-go budgetary philosophy. Rather than hamstring their own economic development, they have developed alternative financing mechanisms that guarantee a balanced operating budget and prudent capital investment.

Again some have argued that a balanced budget amendment would force the Government to operate more like a business. Robert Heilbronner in a recent editorial in the New York Times displayed the flaw in that analysis: Intelligent corporations borrow to finance investments—should governments do otherwise?

Much of the debate over the balanced budget amendment has swirled around issues like the validity of Keynesian analysis and the role of deficit spending in providing economic stability.

Government deficits are increasingly viewed as a debatable policy tool that results in restrictions on private markets. We should not forget that government has another responsibility aside from providing economic stability; government provides the public infrastructure that makes private enterprise feasible. Borrowing is an important part of creating and maintaining our public infrastructure. Richard Musgrave, the foremost expert in public finance describes this logic in straightforward fashion:

> . . . taxes should equal outlays, i.e. that the budget should be balanced. Such at least should be the case regarding the financing of current public services. Capital expenditures, on the other hand, are appropriately loan-financed, with the debt thus incurred amortized over the life of the asset.

In accord with this logic, my amendment excludes the expenditures for capital expenditures from the directive to the President to balance expenditures with revenues.

The exclusion of capital expenditures will lead for the first time to the development of a capital budget of the U.S. Government. This much discussed goal will cause the Federal Government to engage in a budgetary process similar to that conducted by most businesses and other nonprofit and governmental entities.

It will highlight those items for which the Government has committed itself to future interest payments. These items require additional scrutiny to insure that they can generate the return necessary to meet those future commitments.

It has been argued that the development of a capital budget is merely a step designed to remove pressure for lower deficits. This argument is fostered by the type of analysis contained in special analysis D of the budget, "Investment, Operating, and Other Budget Outlays." With this material, one might argue that the White House estimated $91 billion deficit for fiscal year 1983 would have been used to purchase $155.3 billion in investment-type expenditures.

This line of analysis would suggest that we could afford to borrow even more this fiscal year.

There are two shortcomings to this line of analysis. The first is that not all of the items included currently in special analysis D can prudently be classified as capital expenditures. Research and development, and training programs are widely viewed as investments, but their return is so uncertain that they are rarely covered by borrowings in any enterprise.

My amendment uses a much narrower definition of capital expenditures including only fixed asset or additions to fixed assets. Further, it calls upon the Comptroller General to issue guidelines for the proper classification of capital expenditures.

Second, I believe that rather than alleviating the pressure to lower deficits, a capital budget will only add additional weight to the case for lower deficits. A Peat, Marwick, Mitchell study done for the Congressional Budget Office suggests that creating an exemption for capital expenditures of the sort that would be bondable in most States would have reduced Federal expenditures by less than $25 billion in fiscal year 1978. This amendment will keep the pressure on for lower deficits.

Further, the President would be called on to justify the capital expenditure program to be financed with debt. At a time when the cost of capital to the Federal Government exceeds 13 percent, few investments could prudently be considered likely to meet such a high hurdle rate of return.

The development of such a capital budget will lead to a byproduct equal in importance to the incentives it gives to improved budget control. It will lead to increased attention to the status of the Government's assets. It will bring attention to the often hidden state of our public assets. This infrastructure is in critical need. In a most alarming report, Dr. Pat Choate estimates that our Nation's system of highways, bridges, streets, sewers, and systems are decayed. Avoiding their collapse may require the investment of a mind-boggling $3 trillion—the size of the entire United States GNP.

CONCLUSION

For those who believe my amendment still leaves too much budget leeway, I say tighten it. But I urge my colleagues to adopt a standard we can live by beginning today. The public is demanding more than figleaves to cover embarrassment over high deficits and magic elixirs that promise cure-alls for our economic woes. In good faith, we must respond as quickly and as wisely as we can.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain tables and materials prepared by the Congressional Research Service be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Subject: State Instrumentalities Issuing "Non-Guaranteed Debt"

Legislative authority to contract long-term debt without requiring an amendment to the State constitution is granted in seventeen states. In eleven of these—Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, Tennessee, and Vermont—there is no restriction on the amount to be borrowed but extraordinary legislative majorities are required for passage; while in six—Georgia, Hawaii, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Wisconsin—limitations exist on the amount to be borrowed.[1] This memorandum brings together selected references which describe the legal devices used by the States to issue indebtedness which the courts have held does not contravene the constitutional prohibition on the use of the State's "full faith and credit" pledge for repayment.

All of the 50 States have issued some form of non-guaranteed debt as of June 30, 1980, either through State dependent agencies or separately organized activities (e.g., highway toll facilities and auxiliary enterprises at State institutions) or by State created special district-governmental entities. A tabulation in 1976 listed 677 such agencies in all the 50 States excepting Wyoming (See table 1). For the most part, the non-guaranteed debt has been issued for such traditional State functions as transportation facilities, educational facilities, and hospitals. The compilation in Table 2 illustrates the type of State activity for other than these traditional functions.

DEFICITS AND DEFICITS

(By Robert L. Heilbroner)

Alarmed at the size of the mounting deficit, President Reagan has come out for a constitutional amendment to enforce a balanced Federal budget. After the amendment is ratified, the Government will be allowed to spend only what it takes in as taxes. No more borrowing, with its horrendous consequences. Financial virtue will have been restored.

I have a suggestion to make. Why not strengthen the fight against profligacy by widening the amendment to include deficits of all kinds? Specifically, why not make it unconstitutional for businesses to spend more money than they take in as their normal revenues?

There is, of course, a very good reason, small matters of constitutionality aside. It is that a prohibition on business "deficits" would bring an end to much economic expansion. When A.T.&.T. wants to build a satellite, it doesn't normally pay for it from the revenues generated by your telephone calls. It goes out and borrows the money for its new capital investment, or issues new stock. So does Exxon and I.B.M. and the rest of the Fortune 500.

Of course, corporate borrowing and spending isn't called a "deficit." It's called business investment. Nor are the corporate bonds or new stocks looked on as evidence of profligacy. They simply indicate that the process of capital formation has been going on, giving us productive assets that we can kick with our feet, and securities that we can put into safe-deposit boxes. As a result, when we discover that A.T.&T.'s long-term debt has gone up from $32 billion in 1975 to over $50 billion today, we don't talk about profligacy, we talk about growth.

But why isn't this also true of Government? If it is productive for A.T. & T. to borrow money to loft a satellite, why isn't it all right for the Government to do the same thing? If it is growth-producing for Ford or General Motors to borrow money or issue shares to modernize their plant and equipment, why isn't it growth-producing for the Government to modernize the road system so that we can drive the new models without breaking their axles? If it is praiseworthy for I.B.M. to go to the public for money to finance a new research facility, why isn't it equally praiseworthy for the Bureau of Standards or the National Institute of Mental Health to do the same thing? If it is good to build airplanes and apartment houses and steel plants on borrowed money, why is it bad to borrow money to build public transportation or public housing or public waste-reclamation plants?

But, it will be said, the capital expansion of private firms generates additional sales for them, out of which they will be able to pay the interest on their additional debt. True. And isn't it also true that the capital investment of the public sector generates additional gross national product out of which more tax revenues will arise to finance the added interest on the public debt?

Thus, the balanced-budget amendment may save us from profligacy, but it may also force us into poverty, exactly as if the amendment applied to the private sector. For the Government sector, like the private sector, builds for the future, as well as using up wealth in the present. When we spend our public income for arms or postal services, we are consuming our wealth, as we do when we spend our private incomes for sporting rifles or telegrams. To give the budget-balancers their due, perhaps we should limit our public consumption expenditures to the normal flow of tax incomes that the public sector enjoys. But when we spend money for harbors or dams, or for aid to P.S. 162, we are increasing our future capacity to produce, just as surely as when we spend it on machine tools or an Ivy League education. There is absolutely nothing to be said for limiting investment spending, which is growth-producing, to our normal incomes, whether these incomes are derived from sales or taxes.

Looking at the functions of Government as investment or consumption does not tell us whether or not the Government is making wise political or social decisions. It does not even give us a guide as to whether the Government is making intelligent economic decisions. It is possible to make very bad investment choices and very wasteful consumption expenditures. Washington has plenty of examples of both to show for its money. So do Pittsburgh, Detroit, and Middletown, U.S.A.

Nevertheless, breaking down the Government budget into investment and consumption does not help remove what I consider to be the single most serious impediment to the effective use of our economic potential. This is the tendency to think of all Government spending as essentially consumption, and usually wasteful consumption at that. Before we fasten ourselves into a balanced-budget straitjacket, we should remember that American economic growth depends just as crucially on borrowing and spending for investment in the public sector as it does in the private.

AMENDMENT NO. 1986

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. CHILES, Mr. PERCY, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. JOHNSTON) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 58, supra.

IMMIGRATION REFORM AND CONTROL ACT OF 1982

AMENDMENT NO. 1987

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HELMS (for himself and Mr. EAST), submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 2222) to revise and reform the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am submitting an amendment which would remove from S. 2222 the provisions for amnesty of illegal aliens. While I commend the distinguished Chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Policy Subcommittee for his perseverance in bringing a comprehensive immigration reform bill to the floor of this body, I must respectfully disagree with the decision to grant amnesty to millions of foreigners who entered our country illegally and who are living here illegally.

My amendment therefore would delete the amnesty provisions of S. 2222. Basically, it would delete title III in its entirety, the title that supplies the authority for legalization. References in other sections relating to amnesty would also be deleted from the bill and the titles would be renumbered appropriately.

MILLIONS OF ILLEGALS CURRENTLY HERE

Attorney General William French Smith testified on July 21, 1981 that, "We have lost control of our borders." Under this bill, illegal aliens who arrived prior to January 31, 1982—a mere 6 months ago—would be allowed to remain in our country. How many illegal aliens are currently here? While the exact number is impossible to calculate, estimates range from some 3½ million to over 10 million. Some estimates even range as high as 15 million. The administration is currently using a figure of 6 million which, it would appear, is a conservative estimate. Whatever the exact figure is, it is clear that effective measures are necessary to regain control of our borders.

EFFECTS OF AMNESTY

Mr. President, this bill would create a so-called legalization program which would give a legal right to millions of illegal aliens to remain permanently in these United States. It may well be that this amnesty proposal would create a precedent for further declarations of amnesty for those who might potentially be drawn here by the first amnesty program, drawn by the hope that the law would be set aside. The amnesty program in S. 2222 would give a legal right to millions of illegal aliens to seek any job that an American worker has or might be able to find. S. 2222 would give a legal right to millions of illegal aliens to full welfare benefits either immediately or after a

2-year wait in a temporary resident status.

Other potential effects on our society of S. 2222 as currently drafted could include a polarization between Hispanic-Americans and non-Hispanic-Americans. Additionally, polarization could well occur within the Hispanic/American community between those who have legally settled here and those involved in an amnesty program. Amnesty also creates a moral problem in that it rewards law-breakers. In a society such as ours, respect for the law is fundamental to the well being of our local communities and to our Nation as a whole. Therefore, there should be no amnesty provisions in S. 2222.

AMNESTY COULD INCREASE ILLEGAL FLOW

Amnesty for the millions of illegal aliens currently in these United States would establish a dangerous precedent which could well encourage additional illegal immigration. Additional millions of desperate people could head to the United States on the heels of economic chaos or political chaos in their homelands. For example, between the Rio Grande and the Panama Canal there are over 100 million people. If only 10 percent of these people flee economic chaos or political chaos engendered by Communist expansion in this area the illegal population could very well be doubled in this country.

An Associated Press report from Mexico City on July 14, 1982, states that American officials predict that, "One of Mexico's worst recessions since World War II probably will increase the flow of Mexicans going illegally to the United States in search of jobs and a better life." Inflation in Mexico is running at some 60 percent per year and Mexico's foreign debt could reach some $80 billion in the near term. The Mexican peso was devalued by 40 percent in February of this year further adding to Mexico's economic problems.

By the end of 1982, it is expected that some 1 million Mexicans will be unemployed. Unemployment and underemployment now total about 45 percent of the labor force in Mexico and Mexico needs to create over 850,000 new jobs every year just to keep up with its population growth which is one of the highest in the world. Mexico is a resource rich country with oil reserves which are well known as well as mineral and potential agricultural wealth. Yet, Mexico for decades has adopted a type of socialist experimentation—including so-called land reforms—which has brought the country to its current straits. We would hope that Mexican Government and all governments in the region would encourage policies which will lead to real economic growth. We should not adopt our immigration laws just to bail out other nations from the effects of decades of poor economic policies.

AMNESTY AND U.S. UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. President, there are today almost 10 million Americans out of work. Congress should be making every effort to remove illegal aliens from our work forces and should avoid voting for legislation which will grant them legal rights and benefits through an amnesty program. It should be understood that illegals are at work in a broad spectrum of fields. Attorney General William French Smith testified last July that:

> Only 15 percent of the illegals are estimated to work in agriculture; 50 percent are employed in service industries; and 30 percent are in blue collar jobs.

The Federation for American Immigration Reform has pointed out that, "Half of all new jobs created in the late 1970's went to legal and illegal immigrants." FAIR also has pointed out that "There is not a single labor market that immigrants enter in which the majority of workers are not Americans." Marvin Stone, editor of U.S. News & World Report, has pointed out in this regard that, "If newcomers show skill and initiative as workers and entrepreneurs, they often cut in on the livelihood of local people and arouse hostility; if not, they lean heavily on the public purse."

As the Attorney General has said, only 15 percent of the illegals are in agricultural jobs. It is a myth that illegal aliens seek and obtain only low-paying jobs; indeed, a number of studies and reports have found that illegal aliens obtain well-paying jobs. For example, the Phoenix Gazette of December 9, 1981 in reference to a nuclear reactor plant in Arizona stated that, "Immigration officials said they believe the relatively high wage scale, which begins at about $10.50 per hour, has attracted a large population of illegal workers." Human Events ran a story on December 12, 1981 which described a case in Elgin, Ill., in which Immigration and Naturalization Service officers "arrested 69 aliens who earned between $4.50 and $13 an hour." Within hours, the Human Events story reported, "hundreds of local residents had applied for these jobs, all of which were filled within 3 days."

Prof. Donald L. Huddle of the Department of Economics at Rice University has written a report on "Undocumented Workers in Houston Non-Residential and Highway Construction: Local and National Implications of a Field Survey." Professor Huddle has estimated, for example, that one-third, and possibly more, of the workers in the construction industry in the Houston area are illegals. He notes that "residential construction is more heavily infiltrated by illegals than is commercial construction." This is because unions "still act as a partial barrier" in the commercial construction field. The wages earned by illegals ranged from $4 to $9.50 per hour. A study by Frank Bean and Allan King at the University of Texas for Governor Clement's task force on immigration was quoted in The Houston Post of April 7, 1982 and estimated that 1 in every 5 Texas Hispanics is illegal.

From his research, Professor Huddle extrapolates that, "For the United States as a whole, the number of illegals working in construction may reach an estimated 1 million or more." He then goes on to state that "The wages collected by the illegals in construction nationally probably exceed $7 billion per year and could well be over $9.5 billion."

Former Secretary of Labor, Ray Marshall, has stated that removing illegal aliens from the work force could cut our unemployment rate in half. According to Professor Huddle's research:

> The amnesty provisions of the Simpson Mazzoli bill are too generous * * * giving amnesty to illegals * * * will be costly in terms of implementation, will cost unemployed American citizens hundreds of thousands if not millions of jobs, and lead to many more millions of relatives of illegals not now in the United States becoming legalized in the future."

It is important to consider a report by the Congressional Budget Office which shows that each unemployed American received $7,000 annually in unemployment benefits and other public assistance. Thus, 10 million unemployed Americans cost the taxpayers a minimum of $70 billion annually. This does not include the loss of revenues to the Federal Government from tax payments generated by working Americans.

Where there is a genuine need for seasonal foreign workers, for example, in the agricultural field, the answer is a temporary quest worker program. Amnesty is not the answer. In fact, by giving permanent resident status and access to our generous welfare programs to millions of illegals currently in low-paying agricultural jobs to move away from this type of work and into the welfare system.

AMNESTY WILL INCREASE WELFARE COSTS

Mr. President, amnesty would increase welfare costs dramatically. Many millions of illegal aliens would qualify for various welfare programs—AFDC, SSI, medicaid, food stamps, State, and local assistance, and public housing. A number of factors currently are holding the use of welfare programs by illegal aliens down. These include the fear of discovery by authorities and the percentage of illegal aliens who are working males with their families across the border. Amnesty would change the situation significantly.

The National Association of Counties, in their newsletter County News of June 7, 1982 stated that:

Such a legalization program would constitute a costly new Federal mandate which would require State and localities to provide increased services and assistance to illegal aliens granted residency status. As legal residents, they would become eligible for cash and medical assistance not available to illegal aliens. NACo estimates that the total cost to State and local governments for providing such assistance would exceed one-half billion dollars in the first year of legalization alone.

The association is opposing legislation giving amnesty illegal aliens if the Federal Government is not willing to pick up the added billions of dollars of local and State welfare and service costs.

The administration has just released figures which assume an illegal population of 6 million aliens. As noted earlier, this is a conservative estimate. Yet, the administration's cost figures based upon this conservative estimate show that the increased costs in welfare payments under this bill would be some $10 billion in the first 4 years alone. The following table indicates the comparison of the Senate version of Simpson-Mazzoli, the House version of Simpson-Mazzoli, the administration bill, and the proposed Grassley amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPARISON OF VARIOUS IMMIGRATION LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS' WELFARE COSTS OVER PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

[1] Permanent resident (PR) status for illegal aliens here before Jan. 1, 1978. Temporary resident (TR) status for aliens here before Jan. 1, 1982, with PR status after 2 years. PR's eligible for AFDC, medicaid, SSI, food stamps. TR's eligible for SSI and medicaid. Estimated 4,800,000 persons eligible (1,200,000 PR's and 3,600,000 TR's).

[2] PR status for illegal aliens here before Jan. 1, 1978. TR status for aliens here before Jan. 1, 1980, with PR status after 2 years. Same welfare eligibility as Senate version. Estimated 2,700,000 persons eligible (1,200,000 PR's and 1,500,000 TR's).

[3] TR status for illegal aliens here before Jan. 1, 1980, and PR status after 10 years from date of entry. PR's eligible for AFDC, medicaid, SSI, and food stamps. TR's not eligible for welfare benefits. Estimated 2,700,000 persons eligible (600,000 PR's and 2,100,000 TR's).

[4] PR status for illegal aliens here before Jan. 1, 1976. TR status for aliens here before Jan. 1, 1981, with PR status after 4 years. PR's eligible for AFDC, medicaid, SSI, and food stamps. Estimate does not include welfare benefits for TR's. Estimated 3,600,000 persons eligible (600,000 PR's and 3,000,000 TR's).

Mr. President, the welfare costs for the administration bill are misleading if viewing the administration figures alone because the figures presented by the administration are only fiscal year 1983–86 figures. Outyears, from fiscal year 1987 and beyond will show a great ballooning effect as more legalized aliens become eligible for welfare programs. Essentially, the administration bill postpones the additional billions of dollars of welfare costs to a future date, although the administration does not admit that the first 4 years would cost some $1.2 billion.

Mr. President, for a fraction of the increased welfare costs that amnesty would entail, the enforcement capabilities of the Immigration and Naturalization Service could be substantially strengthened. Not only could enforcement be made more effective, but also, jobs could be opened up for hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Americans as enforcement activities take effect over a period of time.

AMNESTY CAN POLARIZE OUR SOCIETY

Mr. President, I fear that the granting of amnesty to millions of illegal aliens could polarize our society. With 10 million Americans out of work, with our economy suffering from unbalanced budgets, and with increasing crime and lack of respect for our laws, amnesty could engender a tremendous backlash.

This backlash could affect relations between Hispanic and non-Hispanic Americans generally as well as between illegal Hispanic and Hispanic-Americans who have either legally settled here themselves or whose parents or ancestors came to land to settle. It is not just illegal Hispanic aliens that we are talking about, of course, there are illegal aliens here from all parts of the world. We must not allow, through an amnesty program, the polarization of our society.

Referring to illegal Mexican aliens, it is important for this body to consider the opinion of Hispanic Americans who are legal citizens. The Dallas Times Herald, for example, on June 3, 1982, carried an article entitled, "Illegal Alien Issue Splits Hispanic Citizens." The article pointed out that:

In Dallas, most of the complaints to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service about illegal aliens come from Mexican-Americans.

The article goes on to state that the regional INS Director, William Chambers, reported that 85 percent of the complaints about illegal aliens are made by Mexican American citizens. He added that:

A lot of people are surprised by this, and it used to be that Mexican-Americans did not get into reporting illegal aliens. But they (Mexican-Americans) are being much more adversely affected than previously. The illegal aliens go into their neighborhoods to live and they are in direct competition with them for jobs.

In an article published by the Washington Post on July 19, 1982, additional information is presented which demonstrates that polarization is already in progress. For example, the distinguished State Senator Hector Uribe who represents the lower Rio Grande Valley in Texas was quoted as warning that:

Those most traumatized (by the Supreme Court's education decision) are Mexican-Americans at the lower rung of the ladder. They see themselves paying for the education of illegal aliens' children. And they see their jobs being taken away by these illegal aliens.

The Post article pointed out a study by the Institute for Constructive Capitalism at the University of Texas which found that among various demographic groups, Mexican American citizens were those most likely to believe that illegal immigration was the most important problem facing Texas. Another study, a poll taken by the Southwest Polymetrics Co. of Austin, Tex., found that 58 percent of those surveyed in the Lower Rio Grande Valley—State Senator Uribe's district—opposed free education to illegal alien children. Among the Mexican American respondents to the poll, the percentage of negative respondents was even higher.

Raul Besterio, superintendent of schools in Brownsville, Tex., expressed his sentiments in the Post article and the sentiments of many Mexican-American citizens stating that:

Think how I feel. I'm a Mexican-American. People say why are you against your own people, Well, I'm an American. I was born and raised here. The Federal Government made me a Mexican-American.

Mr. President, the polarization process has begun in our country between illegal aliens and our fellow citizens. This body must face up to this fact and act in a responsible manner to prevent any escalation in this process and to heal the wounds that already exist.

Mr. President, it is wrong to reward lawbreakers. It is wrong to set in motion a program which will encourage further lawbreaking and which will polarize our society. Citizenship in our great Republic is too precious to grant in a vast blanket program to millions of foreign nationals who have flagrantly violated our laws. We expect our fellow citizens to obey the law. We proudly say that this is a nation of laws. Yet, amnesty for millions of illegal aliens—for millions of conscious lawbreakers—would show our own citizens and indeed the world, that our great country cannot muster the will necessary to enforce our own very generous immigration laws.

What will the working man and woman in this country think of this massive surrender? What will the children of the working man and woman of this country think of this surrender? Will it teach them respect for the law? Or, will it engender disrespect for the law and for our institutions? My office has been deluged by phone calls and letters opposing amnesty for illegal aliens. The public outcry against amnesty for millions of illegal aliens may well exceed anything that we in this Congress have experienced in recent years.

Our duty, as representatives of the citizens of these United States of America, is to protect the interests of the American people. We are not here to legislate bailouts for foreign governments whose internal policies have led to severe problems in their own countries. These governments must accept the responsibility to improve the conditions in their own countries in order to achieve progress.

Mr. President, I hope that all of my colleagues will carefully consider the far-reaching consequences of amnesty for illegal aliens before they vote on S. 2222. What may appear to be the easy way out of a difficult and grave problem will cost the American taxpayer billions of dollars, and could encourage even more illegal immigration as well as a loss of respect for our own legal system and institutions. My amendment would correct this error.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

KEEPING TABS ON THE MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL REVOLVING DOOR

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, the revolving door connecting Defense Department officials and the contractor community has raised serious questions recently. I have brought the issue to the floor of the Senate, in fact, and I bring it up again today. My concern is whether defense plans, programs, and spending are being conducted in the best interest of the American taxpayer.

The widespread use of former DOD personnel as consultants and contractors has been documented many times. Much of this was done at hearings last year conducted jointly by the Senate Subcommittee on Civil Service, Post Office, and General Services along with the House Subcommittee on Human Resources. At that time, the General Accounting Office presented a report prepared at my request detailing this and other abuses in the use of consultants by the Defense Department.

I was, therefore, distressed to learn that DOD is seeking to remove the requirement that consultants and contractors fill out brief reports on their employment. Such reports bring at least a small ray of sunshine to this dark and questionable area, and they should not be discontinued.

In an article in the June 1982 issue of Common Cause, Florence Graves carefully details the Defense Department's efforts to dismantle this disclosure rule. Her article, entitled "The Runaround," should be given serious attention, and I commend it to my colleagues.

I ask that the above-mentioned article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From Common Cause, June 1982]

THE RUNAROUND

(By Florence Graves)

It's a costly and burdensome requirement. Those are two reasons why the Department of Defense (DOD) thinks now is the time to get rid of a regulation that requires certain civilian and military employees, who job-hop through the revolving door between the Pentagon and defense contractors, to report their moves on a simple form which could reveal whether they are involved in conflict-of-interest situations.

In Washington, the revolving door through which federal and private industry employees shuttle is well-known. Congress has tried for years to police the traffic to assure that employees are doing their jobs in the public rather than in their own interest.

The path connecting defense contractors, DOD officials and military officers is particularly well-traveled, and for years critics have worried about the effect of cronyism and mutual understanding on the spiraling defense budget. Are some using their present or former positions to feather their own or their companies' nests?

For example, what role did the revolving door play in Lockheed's enormous $2 billion C-5 A transport plane cost overrun that made headlines in 1968? Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) thinks former Lockheed employees "with an obvious, direct, financial and personal interest" played a significant role.

Are there other government officials like Malcolm Currie, who, as the third-ranking DOD official, approved in the mid-70s the development of the Roland missile, which netted his former company, Hughes Aircraft, a $104 million contract—even though Pentagon officials reportedly said the Army did not want the missile? Currie then left DOD in 1977 to rejoin Hughes. His move was legal, but raised eyebrows nevertheless. (Currie denies any wrongdoing, and says the missile was chosen by the Army.)

With the defense budget expected to soar to $263 billion by 1983—and with nearly half that ($119 billion) going to defense contractors, the question is even more important today than it was 12 years ago when Proxmire proposed this revolving door disclosure regulation after he learned that 2,124 former high ranking military officers were employed by the 100 largest defense contractors.

Proxmire became concerned that the trend "represents a distinct threat to the public interest" because military officers could use their influence and connections to affect decisions on contracts with their companies and active duty officers could be less than aggressive in their negotiations with contractors, knowing they might well be hired by the contractor upon retirement.

On the theory that "sunlight is the best disinfectant," Proxmire proposed requiring certain civilians and military officers who leave the Pentagon to work for a defense contractor doing $10 million or more worth of business with the DOD to complete a one-page form describing their current and former positions. contractor employees taking jobs with the Pentagon would also be required to report for three years after they changed jobs.

While conflict-of-interest statutes were already in place (and they were later strengthened), Proxmire felt they weren't being adequately enforced, and he reasoned that a reporting requirement open to the public would be one way to identify potential conflicts and also would serve to some extent as a deterrent.

But Larry Korb, assistant secretary of defense for manpower, reserve affairs and logistics, says the Pentagon reviewed the 12-year-old regulation and concluded that its costs simply outweigh its benefits.

Just how costly is the regulation? Korb pauses a couple of seconds. "I'd say it's considerable because we had in 1980 something like 1266 individuals" who filled out the forms. "You're talking about a tremendous amount."

How much money are we talking about? "Again, it depends on whether you're talking about direct or indirect [costs]. I would say it costs the government several million dollars a year for all of the things involved in this report."

But you are just guessing. "Well," says Korb, "it's an estimate. If you want to get down and talk about from start to finish, processing the paper, mailing the things out, having them come back in, being compiled, Xeroxed, reproduced and sent over [to Congress], I would say it probably costs the taxpayers several million dollars.

But you don't know for sure. "Well," says Korb, "my figures are as good as anybody else's who's commented on this thing."

Korb's figures may be as good as anyone else's who has commented on this regulation but his figures—or lack of figures—also give you an indication of the kind of analysis done before the Pentagon proposed eliminating it.

Another indication of the seriousness—or lack of seriousness—with which the Pentagon regards this regulation is the fact that David ("Doc") Cooke, the Defense Department's own designated agency ethics officer—the person responsible for advising employes about potentical ethical and conflict-of-interest problems—was not aware the Pentagon was trying to eliminate the regulation.

"When was this?" Cooke asked when interviewed about the proposal which has been in the works for at least a year.

Early in the interview, Cooke described the regulation as the only system he knows of that tracks post-employment conflicts and "a method of ensuring that proper standards of conduct are being followed."

Later, Cooke said he had been caught "somewhat cold" by the interview and hastily added that if Defense Department officials want to get rid of the regulation, "I assume they have a thoroughly documented and reasoned position."

But an analysis by Common Cause magazine shows the Pentagon has only flimsy documentation to substantiate its position.

Furthermore, an informal survey of senior Defense Department officials who came to DOD from defense contractors also shows the lack of seriousness with which this regulation is regarded. In fact, Common Cause magazine picked six high-ranking Defense Department officials at random and found that four had not filed as required by law. Failure to file is a misdemeanor carrying a penalty of up to $1,000 and/or up to six months in jail. Spokesmen for those who did not file said they were simply unaware of the requirement.

Those who had not filed by the 1982 filing deadline include:

Richard DeLauer, undersecretary of defense for research and engineering, previously a member of the board of directors of TRW, Inc.

James Goodrich, undersecretary of the Navy, former chairman of the board of Bath Iron Works Corporation.

T. K. Jones, deputy undersecretary of defense for strategic and theater nuclear forces, who served as program and products evaluation manager for the Boeing Company.

Donald Latham, deputy undersecretary of defense for communications, command, control and intelligence, who was division vice president of engineering at RCA Government Systems Division.

But these officials' failure to file is not unusual.

A comprehensive study, published in 1975, of the reports filed between 1969 and 1973 by the Council On Economic Priorities (CEP), a public interest group, found that more than one-third of those who should have filed failed to do so on more than one occasion.

In the 12 years the regulation has been in effect, we could find no evidence that anyone has ever been penalized for failing to file.

Moreover, Pentagon officials say they have never found even one potential conflict-of-interest situation after reviewing thousands of forms over the years, even though the CEP study and a subsequent 1980 followup study found a significant percentage of what appeared to be "potential conflict-of-interest situations" that would at least bear investigation.

Korb, who came to the Pentagon from the conservative American Enterprise Institute, where he was director of defense policy studies, says the liberal CEP may claim to have found abuses, but "I would submit to you" that "nothing has been done" to correct them because "people have recognized the point of view of that particular group."

But Proxmire says, "God knows, the Defense Department has a bias, too." He says the real problem is that "the Defense Department just has no interest in disciplining or controlling conflicts of interest."

Gordons Adams of the CEP says Defense Department officials have always detested this law and are using the excuse of overregulation "as a cover for reducing public access to important public information." Why? Because, he says, DOD officials prefer "to avoid widespread public disclosure of information on the procurement [of weapons] process." But Korb says, "If you're saying that this [the revolving door] is a great problem, the burden of proof is on you . . . We've sent our rationale up to Congress and it's now up to them to act on the bill" (now attached to the Military Pay Bill).

In addition to actual conflicts of interest, Proxmire is worried about what he considers to be an equally disturbing but more abstract problem. He described it several years ago: "The danger to the public interest is that these firms and the former officers they employ have a community of interest with the military itself. They hold a narrow view of public priorities based on self-interest. They have a largely uncritical view of defense spending . . .

"In too many cases they may see only military answers to exceedingly complex and diplomatic and political problems. A military response or the ability to make one may seem to them the most appropriate answer to every international threat."

It's what President Eisenhower warned of in his farewell speech more than 20 years ago—"the military-industrial complex." It's what Adams calls the "iron triangle." Author of a recent book investigating the politics of defense contracting, Adams says an "iron triangle" binds Congress, the Pentagon and defense contractors in a mutually beneficial relationship that brings contractors "so close to government that they not only carry out military policy but also create it."

While neither Proxmire nor Adams would deny military and contractor personnel the right to accept jobs with defense contractors and with the Pentagon, they do believe the job changes should be carefully monitored. Adams says the forms provide one way for the public to keep track of the movement of people back and forth between the Defense Department and defense contractors, a movement Adams says "creates a set of reinforced perceptions, expectations, mutual friendships, log rolling, trading of favors, et cetera, many of which are quite legal, but which reinforce the closed nature of the entire defense policy-making apparatus. So what you get is a bunch of people who only speak to each other, who never even feel the need to consider alternatives."

Take T. K. Jones, for example. Deputy undersecretary of defense for strategic and theater nuclear forces, T. K. Jones is one of the Defense Department officials who failed to report this year. He is probably best-known around Washington as the mastermind of the "shovel theory" of civil defense. He is convinced that in the event of a nuclear attack, "everybody's going to make it if there are enough shovels to go around."

The shovels, he told The Los Angeles Times earlier this year, are needed to build shelters in the countryside. "Dig a hole; cover it with a couple of doors and then throw three feet of dirt on top. It's the dirt that does it," Jones was quoted as saying.

Jones, whose theory has left those proposing arms limitation in wide-eyed wonder, had a chance, thanks in part to some Defense Department contracts, to refine his ideas at the Boeing Company, one of the largest U.S. defense contractors, which did more than $2.5 billion in defense business in 1981.

The Times reports that while at Boeing, Jones attempted to follow the instructions of Soviet defense manuals by covering machinery with dirt and exploding TNT in the vicinity. "He concluded that the Soviets' plans for evacuating their urban populations, packing dirt around factory machines and digging simple shelters covered by doors and dirt were highly effective," The Times says.

When the administration changed, T. K. Jones took another turn through the well-traveled revolving door linking contractor and Defense Department personnel. It was his third time through. In August 1971, he left Boeing, where he had been a design and systems engineer and a deputy program manager, to become a staff specialist for strategic arms assessment in the office of the deputy director of research and engineering. He later served with the U.S. SALT delegation as senior technical advisor to SALT negotiator Paul Nitze and as a staff assistant to the SALT group at the Penagon. Then in 1974 he left the Pentagon and went back to Boeing as deputy requirements and strategy planning manager.

Now that he's in a significant policymaking position at the Department of Defense, working for a president who favors an expanded civil defense program, T. K. Jones and his shovel theory may be taken quite seriously.

Of course, the public and the press have a comparatively easy time monitoring the T.K. Joneses and the Alexander Haigs of this world (remember, Haig went from commander-in-chief of NATO forces to president of United Technologies, a major defense contractor, before moving on to head the State Department).

But what about the lower profile, although still influential, government and defense contractor officials? Without these forms, the press and public would have no way to keep tabs on potential problems nor to acquire the data to use as the basis for proposing additional reforms.

How serious is the conflict-of-interest problem? Pentagon officials reason that because in 12 years they have never found even one potential conflict of interest after reviewing thousands of forms, there must be no problem.

Gordon Adams of the CEP says if the Pentagon has never found a problem, it's because the Pentagon doesn't take the forms seriously and hasn't really tried to determine whether there are abuses.

Indeed, William Amis, the Defense Department official in charge of the forms, says he hires for one month a year a clerical worker who doesn't have even paralegal training to review the forms for potential conflicts of interest and to compile a statistical summary for Congress. (Amis says the forms have already been reviewed once for conflicts of interest by the military departments who receive them first.)

In his study, Adams examined the reporting forms of employees of just eight major defense contractors and found the revolving door path well worn. Between 1970 and 1979, he found that 1,942 civilian and military employees moved between the Department of Defense or the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) and these eight defense contractors. The defense contractors hired 1,672 of these employees, while 270 contractor employees went to work for DOD/NASA. Adams closely examined the forms filed by civilians and found that, based on the employees' own descriptions, 24 percent were in positions that constituted "an appearance of a potential for a conflict of interest."

Another strong indication of a potential problem is a study recently completed for Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.) by the government's watchdog, the General Accounting Office (GAO). In his search for waste in the Defense Department, Pryor has targeted the $2.6 billion spent every year by DOD on private consultants.

The GAO studied 256 contracts and found potential problems in all but one. Equally alarming, the GAO found 51 percent (accounting for $52.2 million) involved former Pentagon officials, and the GAO questioned "the degree of influence used by former top level DOD officials in securing contracts with DOD."

For example, the GAO found that a $294,597 contract to survey drug and alcohol use and abuse within the military services was awarded to a firm whose vice president was a former director of the Pentagon's drug and alcohol abuse program. The Army awarded a $29,995 contract to prepare an annual report on DOD research facilities to a former DOD employee who for seven years at the Pentagon helped to prepare the report.

But Assistant Secretary of Defense Korb says if there is a problem it will show up on other forms military officers and civilians must complete.

While the Pentagon's proposal to Congress to repeal this regulation makes only passing reference to this point, Korb now says an important reason for repealing the regulation is that it duplicates other laws.

He points to the financial disclosure provisions of the Ethics in Government Act that cover high-ranking civilians and generals in the military, and the statement of employment form that retired military officers must complete to get their retirement pay. This requirement is intended primarily to determine whether retired officers are breaking the criminal law that forbids them to ever sell anything to the department from which they retired and a civil law that forbids them for three years from selling to other military departments.

But as Korb himself finally conceded in an interview, the information provided on these two forms and the persons required to fill out these forms are not the same as the information required and persons covered by the reporting requirements he wants to get rid of. The public financial disclosure provision does not cover military officers below the rank of brigadier general nor does it cover those who leave government. In addition, the questions asked concerning job duties request minimal information.

The military statement of employment form does not cover civilians who enter or leave government, and these forms are not open to the public.

"There's no perfect substitute" for the reporting requirement, Korb agrees, but "again, is there some wholesale violation of the spirit or intent of the law? As far as I know, there's no evidence of anything like that."

But if Korb doesn't think there's enough evidence of a problem, a 1978 GAO report may explain why. The study found that neither the reporting requirement the Pentagon wants to get rid of nor the statement of employment requirement for retired officers are adequately enforced. The GAO found the following weaknesses in both requirements:

Neither requires sufficiently detailed data to facilitate the identification of violations.

Officials do not review the reports for all possible violations.

Neither system's effectiveness has been evaluated.

There are no assurances all those required to file do so.

"The data collected is not always analyzed to determine if persons are complying with the law or regulations. These agencies often just tabulate and summarize the data and submit it to Congress."

Finally Korb offered, "I think the real question is does the fact that you have to fill out the form make people any more honest?"

Sen. Proxmire and Gordon Adams of the CEP say "yes." Proxmire argues that even though the Pentagon does not adequately enforce the reporting law, the fact that the law is on the books and that the forms are open to the public (Adams calls it "the white heat of public disclosure") means it serves to some extent as a deterrent.

Assistant Secretary of Defense Korb, however, argues that the conflict-of-interest laws, which would continue to be in effect even if this law is repealed, are deterrent enough.

Here are some other arguments made by the Pentagon which appear to have flimsy documentation:

The law is "an extensive administrative burden" on contractors. The law does not require contractors to do anything—nothing. While the Pentagon sends a letter to contractors asking them to inform their employees that are covered by the regulation, they are not required to do anything.

A survey of 12 major defense contractors found that while some ask their legal departments to individually inform those who should report, several just print a notice in the employee newsletter and others do nothing.

Furthermore, the Pentagon has no written evidence—neither letters nor a log of telephone calls nor conversations—to verify that contractors have complained about the form. William Amis, the official in charge of the forms, says "a few" contractors in passing conversation have questioned the form; Assistant Secretary of Defense Korb says "several" have complained to him—a small sample by anyone's definition of the more than 400 contractors whose employees were covered by the law last year.

The law is a burden on individuals. "How long would you say it takes to fill out a form?" asks Korb in a tone that suggests the answer is days. The public relations director for the Boeing Company, George Weiss, volunteered that when he filled one out "it was a very simple process" that took "a matter of seconds."

The reports take up a lot of space. Both Korb and Amis emphasized that the reports for the last 12 years now occupy about 20 linear feet—the equivalent of a three foot wide, seven foot high bookcase that would fit easily in a small office and even more easily in the Pentagon which has 3,705,793 square feet of usable space not including closets and hallways. Proxmire suggests that if they take up too much space, the reports could be put on microfilm.

The public rarely uses the forms and Congress never uses them. William Amis says only approximately four people have looked at the forms since 1977. He does not have a log to document the use but instead depends on his memory. Amis had never heard of the two books published by the Council on Economic Priorities, well-publicized in defense circles, that analyzed the reporting forms and made recommendations for reform. Korb says he is familiar with the books, but dismisses them as starting with "a pretty strong bias."

Amis also conceded that he did not know the extent to which the duplicate forms sent to Congress have been used and agreed it is at least "possible" they have been used extensively.

An aide to Proxmire says he refers at least a half a dozen reporters to the forms every year.

In its proposal, the Pentagon states that "to our knowledge the report has never been used by Congress," but Proxmire says he certainly has used them as one investigative tool when he exposed in 1975 the fact that some defense contractors had entertained military and congressional personnel with parties at hunting lodges on the Maryland shore, goose hunts, rides on corporate jets and yachts, and football tickets.

In addition, CEP's analysis of the forms gave Proxmire and Rep. Charles Bennett (Fla.) even more ammunition for their proposed law that would guard against conflicts of interest while allowing federal employees to use their expertise. The bill would prohibit federal employees for two years from working for a contractor with which they had had substantial dealings.

Both Proxmire and Adams think the revolving door problem is potentially so serious that the form should be strengthened rather than eliminated, and recommend that the Defense Department become a true watchdog and aggressively pursue potential conflicts of interest.

Others have suggested that instead of asking the Pentagon to police itself, the forms should be sent for evaluation to the Office of Government Ethics.

Concludes Proxmire, "I seems absolutely ironic for us to kill the reporting requirement at the very time we're greatly expanding the defense operations" that have "become so controversial."

The Defense Department, he reiterates, just doesn't "have any interest in enforcing conflict-of-interest" laws.●

THE NOMINATION OF GEORGE SHULTZ

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for the nomination of George Shultz to be this Nation's 60th Secretary of State. I regret that other important matters forced me to be in Alaska at the time of the vote on his nomination. After having talked with Mr. Shultz personally and having reviewed the statement he made at his confirmation hearings, I am confident that George Shultz can provide the stewardship we need in this vital post.

Mr. Shultz has served under five of the last six Presidents, including terms as the Secretary of Labor, Secretary of the Treasury, and Director of the Office of Management and Budget. More recently, he served as a member of President Ford's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. It is also my understanding that President Reagan has frequently relied on George Shultz for his advice and assistance over the years.

Mr. Shultz' expertise in matters of international trade and economics is of special importance in view of the very serious problems which exist today. In terms of our relations with Western Europe and Japan, trade and economic concerns are probably the most pressing current issues. I plan to follow closely Mr. Shultz' actions with regard to trade sanctions on the Soviets and the Poles.

I pledge to Secretary Shultz my full cooperation and I wish that it would have been possible for me to be here to vote for his confirmation. The challenges he faces are substantial and complex, but if we are to maintain this Nation's leading position in world affairs, these challenges must be met.●

THE NEED FOR FLEXIBILITY ON POLAND'S NATIONAL DAY

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, today marks a dark day in the history of the Polish nation. July 22 is the 38th anniversary of the founding of the Lublin government in Poland. This government was installed after the invasion of Poland by the Soviet's Red Army during World War II. The Soviets, laying claim to having liberated Poland from the Nazis, placed Poland's first Communist regime in power and dubbed it the Lublin government. In fact, the government was made up of pro-Soviet apparatchiks who were willing to subvert Polish independence and freedom in return for being assured leading roles in the new government. Since this gloomy conclusion to Poland's post-war status, July 22 has been declared Poland's National Day.

For over 200 years preceding World War II, Poland's National Day was May 3, the date in 1791 when Poland's most democratic constitution was signed. However, with the intrusion of the Red army into Poland a new national celebration was created in an effort to legitimize the new government.

Poland's National Day is of great importance to the current junta and the domestic situation there. General Jaruzelski is aware that the Polish people are hardly in the mood to celebrate the anniversary of the founding of a system which has brought increased repression and continued economic decline, especially since the declaration of martial law in December of 1981.
